The sections that I have alluded to desire an equal distribution of the national-bank circulation, an increase of the volume of legal-tenders, and free banking with proper restrictions. All they ask is fair dealing, and that in all things the legislation of Congress shall treat all sections alike. The national-bank circulation authorized by law is $354,000,000; of this sum the six New England States have $110,489,966, nearly one-third, of which sum Massachusetts alone has $59,523,671, over one-sixth. Is this equal and just legislation? The five Middle States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, have $124,608,139. So that the six New England States, with a population of 3,487,924, have nearly as much as these Middle States, with a population of 10,716,715.

These eleven States have $235,098,105, leaving only $118,901,895 for the remaining twenty-six States and ten Territories. In fact the New England States alone have nearly as much of the national-bank circulation as all of these twenty-six States and ten Territories. The New England States, as shown heretofore, have a population of 3,487,924, and these twenty-six States and Territories a population of 24,353,732.

No wonder New England is rich and the South poor. No wonder New England is rich and prosperous, and the teeming millions of the great West, almost begging for bread, unable to pay their taxes—asking at the hands of Congress an extension of time in which to make payments upon lands purchased from the Government at nearly nominal prices. Massachusetts alone has more of this bank circulation than all of the fourteen Southern States, including the District of Columbia, together with the great States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska. Is it surprising the South should complain? Are you astonished that the grangers of the West are aroused and that the mighty tramp of that great army of husbandmen is heard all over their rolling prairies? These figures are taken from the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, page 7.

Again, in the same report, page 11, we are told that in the New England States the circulation per head is $31.68. In the Western States, including the great State of Illinois, the circulation is only $7.09 per head. Well may that great State join in this procession. But the most startling disclosure is yet to be made. In the Southern States the circulation per head is only $2.91; in Massachusetts $40.84 per head. Is not all this unwise, unequal, and unjust legislation? Is it not sufficient to render these people of the West and South discontented? Is it not enough to irritate? Is it any wonder these States demand a change?

But some say, "O, it would make no difference if you of the South and West had more banking capital; your condition would not be bettered; the capital would find its way to the East." We ask you to let us be the judge of that. If increase of bank circulation does not benefit, why do you cling to it with such tenacity?

The people of the South, Southwest, and West demand a fair, just, and equal distribution of this circulating medium, and they will have it. If the Forty-third Congress will not give it to them, and also an increase of legal-tenders, they will rise in the might and majesty of their power, and send men to the Forty-fourth Congress that will give it to them, that will do equal and exact justice to all, North, South, East, and West. This is in part what these people want. You may call it by whatever name you please, whether it be contraction, expansion, or inflation. Let the New England States give up a part of their excess of $70,000,000, and supply as far as is needed the deficiency of $51,000,000 that exists in the South and of $21,000,000 that exists in the West

But we are told the bank circulation of the United States is larger now per capita than before the war. Grant it as applied to the whole country; it is not true when applied to the oppressed and downtrodden South. By this same report we are shown that in 1862 in the Southern and Southwestern States the circulation was $71,098,408; in 1873 only $38,160,308. By the census of 1860 these States had a population of 12,071,694; in 1870 a population of 13,543,347. The figures speak for themselves; they constitute my argument and my appeal for justice, just and equal legislation.

These facts, figures, and comparisons constitute some of the reasons why this section of our country are so clamorous; why they are in such financial distress. But these are not all the reasons, this is not all of the unequal and sectional legislation of which we complain. As dark as the picture is that I have presented our wrongs do not stop there.

Turn with me now from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency to that of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the same year. According to the theory of our Government and of all just governments, taxation should be equal and uniform; that is, the people of one State should not be made to pay more to support the General Government than another, their wealth being the same. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that for the year ending June 30, 1875, the revenue received from all sources will be in round numbers $305,700,000. One hundred and eight millions, or more than one-third, is derived from internal revenue; of that the State of Virginia paid last year the enormous sum of $7,343,799, while the whole of the New England States only paid for the same period the sum of $5,515,554.03; and the great State of Pennsylvania only paid $7,826,275. Now, notwithstanding Virginia is compelled to pay this amount of $7,343,799.29 annually into the national Treasury, yet that same Government, after having taxed her State banks out of existence, will only furnish her, as we have before seen, in national-bank currency the sum of $3,902,342. So that we have presented to us the spectacle of a government forcing $7,000,000 of revenue from a State, and only furnishing or allowing the same State one-half of that amount in currency with which to meet the demand. And that same State also has to pay her State, county, and municipal taxes. How can a State prosper under such government? The States of Florida and Mississippi are in about the same condition; the State of Illinois in nearly as bad a condition. She is only allowed a bank circulation of $17,824,209, and has to pay the General Government annually as internal-revenue tax (or did in 1873) the sum of $16,493,169.34. If the grangers of Illinois will cast about them they will see that there is some other cause for their financial paralysis than the railroad monopoly—there is a congressional legislative monopoly, unequal legislation.

It is urged by some that we need no more circulation; that we have an abundance. This cry comes principally from New York and the other large cities—the same parties who besieged the parlors of President Grant in New York last September, urging that there should be issued the $44,000,000 of reserve; but now that these parties have had time to call in from the interior their many millions, they desire contraction. One day they demand increase of circulation, the next contraction.

Let us very briefly examine the question as to whether we have a sufficient circulation. We have already seen that the amount required for the purposes of the National Government alone for the ensuing fiscal year is $305,700,000; by the census of 1870 the amount of tax to be raised annually by the States for State, county, and municipal purposes is $280,591,521, making as the total of the national, State, county, and municipal taxes to be raised and paid by the people the next fiscal year the enormous sum of $586,291,521.

Now, the whole national-bank circulation, fractional currency, and legal-tenders on November 1, 1873, was only $759,161,230; deduct from that amount the proportion to be held in reserve, and it only leaves us a circulating medium of $631,020,512.

The chairman of Banking and Currency places our actual available circulation down as low as $400,000,000; but I think I am safe in saying that our whole circulating medium is not more than the above sum; so that every year every dollar of our circulation is used in paying our taxes, national, State, county, and municipal; and every dollar of this has to be paid in money. It is true it is not all drawn out of circulation at the same time; it is true it is all paid out again during the year; but a considerable portion of it lies in these vaults a good portion of the year. I mention this as one of the great demands for money. The greater the demand for anything the more we ought to have. In 1861, before the war, the national, State, county, and city taxation per annum only amounted to $175,000,000; now, nearly $600,000,000. But these constitute only a small part of the demands of the people for a circulating medium. The people of this country, when the tax-gatherer makes his annual visit, could use the scriptural language of the one to whom was given the one talent, "I knew thee that thou art a hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strewed."

It seems to me that the simple statement of these facts and figures is a sufficient proof that we need more circulation. We certainly need it in the South and West.

But let us pass on. I said in the commencement that in all just governments the burdens and benefits of government should be equally distributed. I have shown you that Virginia alone paid into the national Treasury last year for internal revenue alone the enormous sum of $7,343,799, while all of the New England States only paid for the same purpose the sum of $5,575,554.03. I might continue these comparisons between the different sections of the country, but I will not trespass on your patience. We have heretofore seen the unequal distribution of the national-bank circulation; now let us see the character of the distribution, the expenditure of the public money.

In Senate Executive Document No. 12, on page 18, we find that the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that there have been expended for public works from June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1873, in the six New England States, $12,186,602.32; in the five Middle States, $21,189,318.24; while during the same period there was only expended in the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee the sum of $9,784,506.51. There has been expended in my own State, West Virginia, the small sum of $5,094.25, while during the same period she has paid into the national Treasury for internal revenue the sum of $6,255,606.16. Is such legislation just and equal? O, but we are told that this internal-revenue tax is upon the luxuries, such as tobacco. This is a great fallacy. It is a direct tax upon the labor, the industry of the people. Go out into the tobacco-fields on a hot, broiling day and ask the tobacco-raiser if he thinks the labor in which he is engaged is a luxury. But this unjust legislation does not stop here. The tobacco-raiser is not even permitted to sell his tobacco in the leaf to his country merchant for the necessaries of life unless the tax is first paid; he cannot sell it to the sheriff to pay his taxes!

Nor is this all. We find by the report of the Commissioner of Intenal Revenue for the year 1868, page 321, that there was collected from the cotton-growing States as a tax upon raw cotton for the years 1866, 1867, and 1868, the enormous sum of $64,679,681.53 by a law as oppressive, tyrannical, and unconstitutional as ever passed a legislative body.

There is also now lying in the Treasury of the United States the sum of $14,410,429.17, the proceeds of the sales of captured and abandoned property to which the Government lays no claim.

There is now due from the United States and passed to the credit of the various southern contractors for carrying the mails before the war the sum of $341,078,52, and there is as much more due that has not as yet been examined. This amount of nearly $700,000 thus far has been virtually confiscated. In view of all these facts that I have thus hurriedly grouped together, is it any wonder the South is in an impoverished condition? Are you any longer astonished that there should be such a universal demand for relief; for more money; for inflation, if you please?

One more instance of this partial and oppressive legislation. We have heretofore shown that during the years 1866, 1867, and 1868, when the South was impoverished almost to starvation, a tax was imposed on raw cotton, by which in those three years there was collected from the southern people the enormous sum of $64,679,681.53! Yet by the same law, when the northern manufacturer had manufactured this same cotton into fabrics and exported it out of the country, he was allowed a drawback equal to the amount of this tax imposed. Yet no drawback was allowed the producer if he exported. The practical operation of such a law was simply to transfer this $64,679,681.53 from the pockets of the impoverished southern producer to the plethoric pockets of the northern manufacturer.

It seems to me that the present contest stands thus: The moneyed power holds in its clutches the national-bank circulation and the legal-tenders—they owe no one; they have nothing to sell; no lands, wheat, corn, cotton, tobacco, or cattle. On the other hand we have the landed interest; those who have lands, wheat, corn, tobacco, cotton, and cattle for sale.

If we have greater circulation, more money, the landed power and the agricultural interest will be benefited; they will receive more for everything they have to sell. The contractionist, the moneyed power, wishes to increase the value of their dollar; to make a given amount buy more land, cotton, tobacco, wheat, and corn, and to compel the debtor to give more of these articles to them to pay their debts; and they denounce all as corrupt who will not aid them.

The contest which we now witness is no new struggle. It took its rise immediately after the formation of our Constitution—the moneyed power under the leadership of Hamilton, and the landed interest headed by their noble and trusted leader Thomas Jefferson. The contest is most truthfully and graphically described by ex-President Van Buren in his work entitled Political Parties in the United States.

No one is more desirous of returning to a specie or hard-money standard than I am; but that is impossible at this time and under the present system of national legislation. A very radical change must take place; and no one will more cheerfully assist than myself in inaugurating a system of legislation that will hasten that period when the General Government shall be entirely and forever divorced from the control of the moneyed power of the country; when this overshadowing power of national-bank monopoly will be destroyed.

Mr. MCNULTA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I shall desire to offer when in order.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Amend the bill by inserting after the proviso at the end of section 3, limiting outstanding notes at $400,000,000 the words:

Provided further, Whenever any person shall deposit with the Treasurer bonds of the Government bearing not less than 5 per cent. interest, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, for not less than thirty days nor more than two years, such person shall receive therefor an equal amount of non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes of the Government, commonly called greenbacks. The interest on such bonds shall cease for the whole time they may remain in the custody of the Treasurer, and such person, or his assignee or legal representatives, may at any time within the time for which they were deposited withdraw such bonds in sums of $1,000 by returning to the Treasurer an equal amount of legal-tender notes, which, when so returned, shall be destroyed; and whenever any bonds are not withdrawn within the time for which they were deposited, the Treasurer shall, after giving ten days' notice in some newspaper of general circulation published in the city of Washington, sell the same for legal-tender notes, an amount of which equal to the amount of bonds sold shall be destroyed; the residue, after paying all expenses of such sale, shall be held subject to the order of the person who deposited such funds, or his legal representatives.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st day of April, when the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was making a speech, I addressed to him some interrogatories, and those interrogatories and the answers made to them I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, addressed the House. His speech is withheld for revision.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Before the gentleman sits down, let me ask him a question. I understood him to say there was no man so near or dear to him that, if he opposed him on this doctrine which he has been endeavoring to illustrate, he would support for office. I wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he does not know, after the Supreme Court had decided against the validity of the legal-tender notes, that General Grant before his last election reconstructed that court? I ask him if, after all that which he pronounced against it, he did not support General Grant himself when he ran the last time for the Presidency?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not see any conundrum in that at all.

Mr. HEREFORD. And that, too, in order to give validity to greenbacks, which the gentleman from Connecticut has denounced as a thing to which he was opposed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think the gentleman is so ready to repudiate his party, or any man who stands so near to him, because he differs from him in opinion on a subject of this sort.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If the gentleman from Connecticut will allow me I will answer, and I will do it in one word.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let the gentleman from Connecticut answer. He has declared that, for himself, he would support no man who does not square with him on this question of finance, as he enunciated it to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not know exactly what the gentleman is driving at, but he seems to charge me with inconsistency in supporting General Grant for the Presidency at the last election. General Grant has declared himself uniformly, from beginning to end, in favor of resumption of specie payment. I do not make the issue upon the constitutionality of greenbacks in time of war. I say there was great doubt, even under the war necessity, that we had a right to issue them, but I regard that question as settled. I regard the Supreme Court as having decided we had the right under the pressure of the great calamity of war to issue them. At all events the discretion rested with Congress, and Congress having exercised it, it remained only for the Supreme Court to say we had that power. I am not fighting on the constitutionality of the original issue.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me ask the gentleman to answer my question. He has not yet come to the point. It is well known to the country that the Supreme Court, as organized before the appointment of the new judges, had come to the decision that "greenbacks" were unconstitutional as a legal tender. General Grant, for the purpose of reversing that decision, or having them declared valid, reorganized the Supreme Court, when a new decision was made. Yet the gentleman from Connecticut supported with all his power and influence General Grant for the Presidency after the occurrence of these events.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I could go on for some considerable time to explain that reorganization of the Supreme Court, but I do not know that I could commit the question to better hands than to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] to whom I yield the floor.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The fact is not as the gentleman from Wisconsin states it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have put the question to the gentleman from Connecticut and I want him to answer.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That slander has been repeated from the stump until it has once or twice been put squarely down. I published a letter, under my own hand, giving the dates, which contradict it perfectly, and the gentleman is utterly mistaken about it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not wish the gentleman from Connecticut to appear by counsel. [Laughter.] I wish him to answer it himself.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am stating a fact. It is not a matter of ability, it is a matter of truth; and I say the gentlemen who were put upon the bench of the Supreme Court were nominated before the first legal-tender decision was given. Their nomination was sent in to the Senate on the morning of the very day on which that decision was given and reached the Senate before the decision was given in the Supreme Court, and when it was reported in Washington that the decision of the court was going to be the other way. There was no more reason to believe those two gentlemen would give a different opinion on the legal-tender question from that which the court first gave than there was that Chief Justice Chase would give a different opinion—nor half so much at the time they were nominated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows and the country knows very well the decision would have been one way if there had not been added two other judges, and he knows very well the decision was finally a different way with these two other judges.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. But the gentleman said that these gentlemen were put there to reverse the decision.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I understood the gentleman to say so. He said General Grant reorganized the court "for that purpose."

Mr. ELDREDGE. I stated that it was very well known to the country that the decision was against the validity of the greenbacks as a legal tender, and that after that two judges were added to the bench, and then there was a different decision.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. They were not; and there is where I differ from the gentleman. I say that their nomination was sent in before that decision was given.

Mr. ELDREDGE. They took part in the decision, but if the decision had been given before it would have been different from what it was, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. They were appointed before the decision was made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That makes no difference. That does not alter the case. The Supreme Court had considered the question, and two judges were added afterward, and a different conclusion was come to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. But they were appointed before.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not care when they were appointed. They did sit in the case, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. RICE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois very much.

Mr. RICE. Is my motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It will be perceived by the House that in what was said in answer to the questions I put to the gentleman from Connecticut I was charged with slander, and an insinuation was made that what I said was untrue. Now I have taken the pains to look up this matter, and what I shall say now is in vindication of the facts of history. I hold in my hand 12 Wallace's Reports, in which there is a note appended on page 528 to the case of Hepburn vs. Griswold, which was the legal-tender case in which a decision was come to by the court and afterward changed by additional judges being put upon the bench. That note is to the following effect:

"Hepburn vs. Griswold, it is stated in the opinion of the court in the case, was decided in conference November 27, 1869, (8 Wallace, 626,) there being then eight judges (the Chief Justice and seven associates) on the bench, the lowest number to which the court had been reduced. One of them, Justice Grier, resigned February 1, 1870. The judgment in Hepburn vs. Griswold was announced from the bench and entered February 7, 1870. Mr. Justice Strong was appointed February 18, 1870, and Mr. Justice Bradley March 21, 1870, and the order for the present argument was made by, and the argument itself heard before, the court of nine, as constituted by the act of April 10, 1869.

Now, I have taken pains to send to the Senate and ascertain what the record there shows. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] says that the nomination of these two judges, Justices Strong and Bradley, was made before the decision was announced; but he added, on the same day. Now, I find that the decision was announced on the 7th day of February, 1870, and that both nominations were made and sent to the Senate on the 8th day of February. The confirmation by the Senate of the nomination of Justice Strong was on the 18th of February, 1870, and that of Justice Bradley on the 21st of March, 1870.

Now, there is the record as it stands in the Senate to-day, as I understand it. It shows that the nominations of those two justices were sent in on the 8th of February, the decision having been announced on the 7th, one day previous. But the point which I made was that the decision was known before the nomination of these judges. In 8 Wallace I find this statement:

It is proper to say that Mr. Justice Grier was a member of the court when this cause was decided in conference, (November 27, 1869,) and when his opinion was directed to be read, (January 29, 1870,) stated his judgment, &c.

So that the Supreme Court, as it was organized before the appointment of these two judges, came to their decision on the 27th of November, 1869, and ordered their decision to be promulgated and read on the 29th of January, 1870.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman when he reads from a volume of Supreme Court reports have the goodness to indicate, so as to get into our reporters' notes whether he is reading from the opinion of one of the judges or from the notes of the Supreme Court reporter?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I indicated the note when I read it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I did not so understand it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And I find still further in connection with this matter, upon examining a file of the New York Tribune, that on the 1st of February, 1870, the Washington correspondent of that paper wrote that the Supreme Court had come to a decision, which was ordered to be rendered, and that it would unquestionably be against the validity of the greenbacks as a legal tender. That letter is dated January 29, 1870. It was stated in that letter that the decision would be rendered one week from that time; and it was, in fact, rendered one week from that time.

At the time I was making my remarks in interrogation of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] I said that I had no dates by me, that I spoke only from general recollection. My general recollection is, and I think that is the recollection of a majority of the members of this House, that from the time the Supreme Court came to its decision in its consultation-room and ordered its decision to be read, on the 29th of January, 1870, it was generally understood in the country that a decision had been come to, and that it was against the validity of the legal-tenders. It was certainly announced in the New York Tribune by its regular correspondent one week before the decision was actually read and promulgated what it would be.

Now I leave the facts to the country to determine whether I slandered anybody, or stated that which was untrue. I submit, not my motives, but that the facts justify the position which I took on that day. I think they do not justify the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] in saying that it was a slander, when I simply stated the facts.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If I have said anything uncourteous regarding the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] I should most deeply regret it, because in the debates in this House I propose to treat every gentleman with respect.

I said the other day that that was a slander which had come from the stump. I said that the gentleman from Wisconsin was misinformed as to the facts, was mistaken. I supposed that was courteous, and imputed nothing derogatory to him individually. I said that the charge against the President of the United States of reorganizing the Supreme Court for the purpose of reversing its decision upon the legal-tender question—and that is what the gentleman said; that is what appears in the RECORD as his statement, and it was to that I was replying—I said that statement was based upon a misapprehension of the facts, which I knew and which I stated to the House.

The gentleman now says to the House that he has sent to the Senate and obtained information that the nominations of the two judges in question were made on the 8th of February, 1870. Now, wherever he may get his information, I repeat again that he is misinformed, and that such information is not true. I have myself to-day shown the gentleman a copy of the Washington Chronicle, published on the morning of the 8th of February, 1870, which contains the legal-tender opinion delivered the day before, Monday, (the day on which the court delivers opinions,) with an editorial statement that it was delivered the day before. The same paper contains an announcement of the nominations sent to the Senate by the President the day before, the 7th of February, 1870, of these two judges; and it contains biographical notices of them, and an editorial stating the regret of the editors that the court should have announced their decision without waiting until the court was full, or at least consulting the two new judges that had been added to the court. And I have no doubt that if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] will look up a copy of the Evening Star of Washington of Monday, February 7, 1870, he will find in it the announcement of the appointment of both of those judges.

From my relations to the Administration at that time, and I may say from some relation to the question of filling those vacancies which is not likely to make me forget it——

A MEMBER. The nominations went through your office.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes; they went through my office; and therefore I know those nominations were made out and sent to the President before the legal-tender decision was made, before I knew or had any reason to know what it was to be. I suppose the court kept their own counsels; they do about their decisions. I suppose the correspondents of the papers sent off their guesses as to how that question was to be decided. And the gentleman would probably find, upon examination, that in the New York Tribune the guess of the correspondent was one way, in the World another, still a third way in the Herald, and so all over the country.

I know it was reported in this city on the morning of the day on which the decision was given that it was to be the other way. And with my knowledge of Chief Justice Chase, I must say that I gave him the credit of sharing in that opinion until it was delivered. Now the charge is that the appointment of those two judges was made to secure a reversal of a decision already made.

I presume, of course, the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct in saying that he obtained his information from the Senate; but in that case the person sending him the information was mistaken. I can suggest how the mistake may have happened. When nominations are sent to the Senate, if that body does not at once go into executive session they may be laid on the table; and thus, although these nominations went in on the 7th, they were not perhaps put on the record of the Senate until the 8th. That they went in on the 7th I know to be the fact. But the selection of those gentlemen as judges had been made weeks before; their nominations were actually made out before that time in the office of the Attorney-General.

It is a gross injustice to those eminent and honorable men to say that they were put upon the bench at that time for the purpose of reversing an opinion of the court. Mr. Justice Strong's nomination had been agreed on, as was understood, for weeks before. That of Mr. Justice Bradley was recommended, as I understand, by the whole bench and bar of New Jersey without distinction of party.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Was it not known to the gentleman and to the whole country that Justice Strong's opinion on this subject was what he afterward declared from the supreme bench?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman; I ask him not to do it; I am coming to the point he suggests.

That Mr. Justice Strong, whose nomination had been for some weeks talked of and understood to be agreed on, was of the opinion that the legal-tender act was constitutional is undoubtedly true. He had, as judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, given an opinion—one of the ablest, if not the ablest, delivered by any State judge—in favor of the constitutionality of that act. But was that a reason why he should have been excluded from the nomination, or why it should be said that he was picked out for a particular purpose and not on account of his eminent professional record, the purity of his character, and his marked fitness for the office which he now adorns? If such a rule had been adopted, I can only say that the judges of every State court in the Union that had passed upon the question, with the exception of the State of Kentucky, (and in that State the chancellor, the ablest of the highest judges there, gave a dissenting opinion,) would all have been excluded, because every State court before which the question had arisen (with the single exception I have indicated) had sustained the constitutionality of the legal-tender act. If such a rule had been followed, the President must have gone around groping to find somebody adverse to the general sentiment of his party and the general sentiment of his country to take a position on the supreme bench.

I say to this House and to the country that the selection of those two gentlemen was made on character, on professional eminence, on fitness for the office; and whether the slander was originated by one man or another, it is a slander upon them to attribute their appointment to their subserviency upon a particular question or for a particular interest. Their appointment was sent to the Senate before the decision on the legal-tender act was announced.

As to Mr. Justice Bradley I will make only one further remark. I did not know at that time what his opinions were on this question; I supposed they were those of the great mass of the republican party to which he belonged. I said to a friend of his, "I suppose Mr. Justice Bradley agrees with the republican party on this legal-tender question." The answer was, "I do not know whether he does or not; I never heard him say anything about it. All that I do know is that he was the attorney of a corporation that had issued before the war bonds that were still outstanding; and he advised them that both honor and honesty required them to pay the principal and interest in gold." That remark, concurring very much with the views I had entertained, satisfied me that I should be willing to take his judgment on one side or the other, as that of an honest and upright man, upon the constitutionality of the legal-tender act in time of war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] is entitled to the floor, and yields to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. I gave notice yesterday that I had been instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to move the previous question at the close of the debate to-day. As matters now stand I cannot make the motion. If the House, desiring to bring the debate to a close, will vote down the motion to adjourn and hear the gentleman from Indiana to-night, I will then make the motion; or if the House decides to adjourn, I will accept that as an indication of the sentiment of the majority, and will allow the debate to go on awhile to-morrow before moving the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a petition, numerously signed by manufacturers of New Jersey, asking that a specific duty of one cent per pound on tin may be adopted; thus doing away with the conflicting appraisements between market value and cost prices. Tin must be contracted for some months beforehand; so there is always a conflict between the actual cost and market value at the time of shipment. If an importer contracts for tin in January at thirty cents a pound and in March it sells at twenty-five cents, the contractor must invoice the tin at thirty cents; if it rises to thirty-five cents he must invoice the tin at thirty-five cents, while the foreign commission merchant invoices his goods at the time of shipment, thus giving him a great advantage over the American importer; and any advantage given to the commission merchant is also an advantage given to foreign commerce. I call the attention of the Committee on Finance to this numerously signed petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to that committee.

Mr. INGALLS presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and one from Enoch Hoag, superintendent of the central superintendency, protesting against the passage of House bill No. 1725, providing for the sale of the Black Bob lands in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented petitions of manufacturers and dealers of Christiansburgh, Virginia; Charlottesville, Virginia; Alexandria, Virginia; Danville, Virginia; Dublin, Floyd Court-House, Virginia; Farmville, Virginia; Lynchburgh, Virginia; Norfolk, Virginia; Portsmouth, Virginia; Petersburgh, Virginia; Richmond, Virginia; and Staunton, Virginia, praying for the conversion of the present ad valorem duty on tin plates into a corresponding and equivalent specific duty; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Bernard Pitzer, of Roanoke, Virginia, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by troops of the United States in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAYTON presented additional papers in the case of the claim of Cane Hill College, for compensation for the loss of a church destroyed by fire; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the International Ocean Telegraph Company, praying to be allowed a register for the steel-clad steamship Suffolk; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of G. H. Bernhard, praying compensation for subsistence and lodging furnished to recruits for the Fourth New York Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT presented a petition of citizens, dealers, and manufacturers, citizens of California, praying that an import duty of one cent per pound on tin plates, including the boxes, may be substituted in lieu of the present ad valorem duties; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of citizens of Elmwood and vicinity, Illinois, asking an increase of the volume of currency and for free banking; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Clinton and Madison Counties, Illinois, for the passage of a law preventing the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Robert McDonald and others, soldiers of Company G, Forty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying that the charge of desertion may be removed from their record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE presented the petition of William G. Jones, of Mobile, Alabama, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that E. M. Dennison, upon whose claim an unfavorable report was made a few days ago, be allowed to withdraw his petition and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made, the Secretary retaining copies.

Burnside, in November, 1863, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Morris, of Arkansas, praying compensation for machinery sold by the Government as abandoned property, amounting to $10,000, and interest from March 1, 1864, to January 1, 1873, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 669) referring the petition and papers in the case of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas, in so far as the same relates to cotton seized, to the Court of Claims, to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. I make this report in the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] who had it in charge.

SHELVES BETWEEN DESKS IN SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of the Rules, to whom was referred a resolution in relation to the placing of shelves between the desks in the Senate Chamber, to report it back without amendment. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, heretofore submitted by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont:

Resolved, That no shelves shall be allowed to be placed between any desks in the Senate until the Senate shall take some action in relation thereto.

Mr. BAYARD. Why should this matter take the shape of a resolution? If it be the desire and for the convenience of two Senators to have a shelf between their desks upon which books and papers may rest, why not allow them to do it? Gentlemen who do not desire to have these shelves between their desks need not have them there. The other day the Senator who sits on my right was suggesting to me the great convenience of having a little shelf placed between our tables, which might hold the bills and papers that are constantly accumulating. I do not see why a stringent resolution should pass the Senate on this subject. The Senators who desire to have a thoroughfare between their tables can preserve it; no one will have a right to put a shelf there; but where Senators sitting next each other desire for mutual convenience that a shelf should be placed between their desks, I really can see no objection to it. I submit it is a great deal better to leave these matters to the individual predilections of members as to one side of their own desks. It would not of course form a continuous bar in either the outer or inner circle of desks; but I have found (if I may give my own experience) so much convenience from having a bench between my table and the adjoining one that I should be sorry to be deprived of the right to have one, and indeed I was about to ask leave to have it done or give directions to the Sergeant-at-Arms to have it placed there. For that reason I should be sorry to see a resolution prohibiting such a convenience if Senators desire it. Unless there be some better reason given for it than I can think of, I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The resolution did not originate with the Committee on the Revision of the Rules, but was referred to the committee, and they have unanimously reported in favor of its adoption. If the Senator from Delaware will remember, it is but a short time since the railing surrounding the outer seats of the Senate has been removed; and one objection to that railing was because of the passages that were made in order to accommodate the railing to the seats of Senators. It compelled Senators who were sitting interiorly, between the passages, to move either foward or in the rear to allow the outer members to reach the seats of members on the interior. The Senator from Delaware and others who are seated on the outer row do not meet the inconvenience that Senators find who occupy interior seats. The difficulty in passing by or passing in does not affect them, but it does other Senators.

If two Senators sitting together have a shelf between their desks we cannot well prevent other Senators from having the same accommodation, and I have found in several instances that it has been a serious inconvenience in getting in and out of the seats. The Senator who introduced the resolution saw that if one Senator had a shelf placed for his convenience, it would lead to other shelves being placed, and the space being once broken in upon, there could be no objection to shelves being put between all the desks; and if that were done, Senators will see how difficult it would be to reach the seats. The only way then would be to go around and pass through and interrupt Senator after Senator until the seat was reached to which the Senator might be entitled. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to add to what the Senator from Delaware so well said about shelves, that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEWIS] and myself had agreed to have one on the left-hand side of my seat to be jointly used, leaving the right-hand on either side of us open. I hope Senators who do not want shelves will not deprive those who do wish them of the privilege. It seems to me to be out of the regular order.

Mr. TIPTON. On this side of the Chamber we have a left hand, and if each one would fill up his left hand, the rows would be filled up and no one could get out. That is our difficulty.

Mr. STOCKTON. I am not aware that any serious difficulty has yet arisen between any Senators in this body in reference to ingress or egress from their seats. I think in the Senate of the United States the individual members of it can arrange these things among themselves so satisfactorily that the Senate will not be required to pass any law on the subject. I am sure that the gentlemen sitting on my side of the Chamber are so amiable that no shelf will be put up that any Senator will object to. In regard to those gentlemen who sit on the inner circle objecting to those who are unfortunate enough to be on the outer circle having shelves between their desks, I have only to say that I think, being in the inside ring, they ought not to complain too much of those who have the misfortune to be away off where we find it so difficult sometimes to attract the attention of the Presiding Officer, and where we often cannot hear, and are unfortunate enough sometimes not to be able to make ourselves heard. The inside seats are considered the choice seats, and if a Senator in getting to them should have to pass around one desk and pass between the next two, I do not think it is a hardship that requires the action of a law; at least until there is some complaint made. I think that this will be a very proper resolution when any Senator or any number of Senators shall find themselves incommoded by the method in which such shelves shall be put up.

Mr. HAMLIN. When this resolution was offered to the Senate my impressions were that it was not called for and that it might perhaps be unwise to adopt it. On reflection, however, I have changed my opinion, and as a member of the committee I agreed to its report. I think it ought to be adopted, and I will state in a very few words why I think so.

In the first place Senators who sit upon the outer row of seats are not troubled in getting to or retiring from their seats. They do not labor under the same difficulty that we do who have interior seats. The rule would not, therefore, apply to them as it would apply to other members of the Senate not situated as they are.

It is said that as the seats were formerly arranged I could not approach my seat without disturbing the Senator upon my right or upon my left. I think it was an annoyance to them. If it was not, I know it was an annoyance to myself to be obliged every time I took my seat or left it, if those Senators were occupying theirs, to ask them kindly to remove. I was obliged to do so. The Senate ordered the seats to be changed. They are now changed, and I can approach my seat without difficulty. I can reach the seat of every other Senator in this body with whom I wish to confer without disturbing anybody.

Now, if the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] who sits next me and myself shall agree that we will put a shelf between his desk and mine, it might be very agreeable to us; but I do not know the rule that the Senate could apply by which my esteemed friend on my right [Mr. HOWE] should not put a shelf between his desk and mine as well. Now, as the seats are, each Senator can approach and leave his seat undisturbed, each Senator can approach every other Senator without disturbing anybody. Put in your obstructions in one case, and it leads to putting them in in another, and I do not see how you are going to draw distinctions. Where two Senators agree to have a shelf, the next may want one in the same way, and you thus lead to the difficulty of creating a great trouble, the same trouble that existed before in the case of Senators going to and from their seats, or you enforce a rule that will allow a part of the Senators to have these benefits and the others not.

With these views I thought it wise to adopt the resolution, and I think so now.

The resolution was agreed to; ayes 26, noes not counted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 680) for the relief of certain persons of African descent resident in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations on the 28th day of April, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 681) to secure anti-monopoly cable communication between Europe, America, and Asia, by W. Cornell Jewett and his associates; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to say, in introducing this bill, that I do not indorse the statements in the preamble of it.

DELINQUENCIES OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. A few days ago I offered a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the indebtedness of paymasters, quartermasters, collectors of internal revenue, collectors of customs, and officers of the Freedmen's Bureau. As I do not desire to call for any information but what is deemed proper, I ask that that resolution be now taken up for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 27th of March:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate a statement in detail showing the amounts due and yet unpaid to the Government from January, 1865, to the present time from paymasters, quartermasters, commissaries, collectors of internal revenue, collectors of customs, officers of the Freedmen's Bureau, or any other officer or set of officers whose accounts are under his supervision; that he further inform the Senate how such of the delinquencies as have been arranged have been settled, whether by compromise, dismissal, or otherwise; and that he further inform the Senate the names of all of said delinquents, and from what States they were appointed, and whether there are any suits now pending for the recovery of such moneys, and, if so, against whom and for what amount.

Mr. DAVIS. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST. I offer an amendment to the resolution, which I also ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance. It is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate a statement in detail showing the amount of defalcations to the Government from March 4, 1853, to March 4, 1873; what amounts have been paid, and what amounts are due and yet unpaid, from paymasters, quartermasters, commissaries, collectors of internal revenue, collectors of customs, officers of the Freedmen's Bureau, or any other officer, or set of officers, whose accounts are under his supervision; that he further inform the Senate how such of the delinquencies as have been arranged have been settled; whether by compromise, dismissal, or otherwise. And that he further furnish the Senate the names of all said delinquents, and from what States they were appointed; and whether there are any suits now pending for the recovery of such moneys, and, if so, against whom and for what amount. And the Secretary of the Treasury is further directed to tabulate the information herein required, throughout the several Administrations since the 4th of March, 1853, so that the relative collections and disbursements of public money and the percentage of defalcations during each period of four years shall be exhibited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution and amendment will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

ASBURY DICKINS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] entered yesterday a privileged motion, to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins. I suppose of course the Senator does not wish to delay action on the bill; and as it has been discussed so much and the discussion is now fresh in the recollection of Senators, if he is prepared to take up that motion now, it seems to me it would be better for all concerned to have it disposed of. I wish to consult his convenience about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to proceed to consider the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; I make that motion if the Senator from Wisconsin is ready to go on with it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I entered that motion to reconsider not because I felt any assurance that I could present to the Senate any argument upon the question of law involved which had not already been presented, but several Senators said to me before the vote was taken that I ought to say something upon the question, because I had served for a very long time upon the committee from which this bill comes, and I noticed that the majority in favor of the passage of the bill was not large.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The committee reported against it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The majority of the committee were opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I am speaking of the majority of the Senate. The majority of the Senate in favor of the passage of the bill was not large, and I thought I would enter the motion to reconsider and submit two or three observations to the Senate.

In the first place, Mr. President, I must say that I concur entirely in the views urged here so forcibly by the majority of the Committee on Claims. To my mind there is no principle of law and there is no sentiment of equity which calls for or will justify the payment of this claim. I understand precisely how ardently a Senator like my honorable friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who knew the father of these claimants, and cherishes still for him that warm personal regard that I understand is felt for him by all who ever knew him, may be induced to favor the appropriation of a small sum of money to the heirs of that very excellent gentleman. But that Senator will admit, and every Senator will admit, that the dictates of our personal sympathy are not a safe guide for the appropriation of public money.

The first question the Senate ought to consider is, have these claimants a legal claim on the United States? I agree that if they have, the mere lapse of time since the claim originated is very far from being a reason why it should not be paid now. It is an additional reason why it should be paid. So far as that, I concur entirely with what was said by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL;] but I respectfully submit that the long period which has elapsed since this claim is said to have originated is a very strong circumstance to show that the claim is not well founded. It is astounding, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States should have refused for year after year and for a quarter of a century, obstinately refused, to pay such a man as Asbury Dickins a few thousand dollars, when by the laws of his country and of your country he was entitled to those thousands.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate did not refuse, but the Senate, time after time, passed the bill, and the House of Representatives passed it also; only they did not pass it at the same session.

Mr. HOWE. I say, Mr. President, it is astounding that, not the Senate, but the Congress which represents this country, should have refused for year after year and for a quarter of a century to pay to such a man as Asbury Dickins a few thousand dollars which by the law of this country Asbury Dickins was entitled to. I think my friend from Rhode Island, I think any Senator on this floor will concede that Congress was and is much more likely to pay a few thousand dollars to such a man as Asbury Dickins was, to which he was not legally entitled—pay it to him as an act of grace, an act of courtesy, an act of kindly consideration, of favoritism if you please, than to withhold from him a dollar which was legally his.

It is not only astounding that the Congress should have refused to recognize this claim, but it is astounding that Mr. Dickins himself should not have known of it for a great many years; I do not remember just now how long after the claim arose. Upon the theory pressed here, here was a citizen entitled to several thousand dollars out of your Treasury, and the Government did not know it, and he did not; and yet the Government knew every fact on which the claim rested, and he knew every fact on which the claim rested. What were those facts? Ashbury Dickins held an office. He held office, I believe, all his life, or all the latter part of his life. He held a specific office, which entitled him to a specific salary, but did not charge him with specific duties. He was a chief clerk in some one or more of the Executive Departments of the Government. What were his duties as chief clerk? The Senator from Oregon cannot tell us; the Senator from Rhode Island cannot; the Senator from Indiana cannot.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can tell the Senator that it was no part of his duties as chief clerk to act as Secretary of State or Secretary of the Treasury and perform the duties of head of those Departments ad interim.

Mr. HOWE. I said the Senator from Oregon could not tell what were his duties as chief clerk. He undertakes to tell me what they were not. My honorable friend on my left [Mr. HAMLIN] says that he can tell. I will listen with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. HAMLIN. That was a remark which I made to my friend; but if he calls on me I will tell why this claim has not been allowed before. It is for the very reason that such minds as my friend from Wisconsin possesses have been possessed by other men who have been here before us, and they have attempted to satisfy the Senate that we should not pay a just claim because there are other claims like it that should be paid if we paid that; and if they did not have that argument on which to reject it, there would be some other. I insist that these old claims mainly grow stale by objections that do not address themselves to my mind as substantially sound; and that is the reasons claims grow old here. That is my judgment.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator may have answered some question remarkably well; but he has not answered the question I put. Instead of showing that he was capable of answering it, he simply shows that he did not know what the question was. I did not submit the question why this claim had not been paid. I asked the simple question what were the duties of chief clerk of one of your Executive Departments.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought my friend asked, and I thought he asked it of the Senator from Rhode Island, why has not this claim been paid; and he said it was astounding that Congress had not passed it long before, and I gave the reason why they had not done it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator undertook to give a reason. I had passed that point in the discussion a good while. I do not accept his reason as a conclusive reason why Congress should pay this claim now. I turn to my friend from Oregon; he does not say what are the duties of the chief clerk of one of your Executive Departments. He does undertake to say with considerable confidence that it was not one of his duties to discharge the functions of a Secretary of State or a Secretary of the Treasury. How does he know? Who told him it was not his duty? What statute says it was not his duty? I undertake to tell the Senator that it was his duty at that time. Why? Because he held an office which subjected him to the control of his superior, which charged him with this one duty of doing what he was told to do by his superiors in accordance with law.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? Mr. Dickins did not discharge these duties under the direction of his superior in office, but under an appointment made by President Andrew Jackson, made in conformity with the act of 1792.

Mr. HOWE. Was President Jackson the superior in office of the chief clerk or was he the inferior?

Mr. PRATT. I supposed the Senator referred to his immediate superior.

Mr. HOWE. No; I said his superior in office. In accordance with law his superior in office assigned to this chief clerk on some day certain duties in the office of the Secretary of State, on other days certain duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of discharging any duty in the office or in the room of the chief clerk. That was all. He was transferred from one room in an Executive Department to another room in that Department. That was all. He filled just one office, no more, no less. The law entitled him to just one salary, no more, no less. He spent so many hours, no more, no less. He ought to have compensation for it. He did have compensation for it, the very compensation for which he had agreed to work for the country. When he was discharging the duties of Secretary of State he was not discharging the duties of any other office. He could do but one duty at a time.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator says that when he was discharging the duties of Secretary of the Treasury he was not at the same moment discharging the duties of chief clerk, unless he was able indeed to perform both duties at the same time. Now the purport of the bill before us is to give him the compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury during the time he was discharging the duties of Secretary of the Treasury; not to pay him double for duties performed at the same time as chief clerk and as Secretary of the Treasury, but simply the compensation which the law provided at the time for the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. The law provided a compensation for the Secretary of the Treasury, provided a Secretary of the Treasury, and paid a Secretary of the Treasury. This man never filled the office of Secretary of the Treasury. He sat there in his room some hours and some days when a Secretary of the Treasury was not needed, when he could be absent from his room, when there were mere clerical duties to be discharged, and this man was designated under authority of law to discharge those clerical duties, and he received for his labor precisely the compensation for which he had agreed to work for the United States.

Now what becomes of either the legal or the equitable claim? He received all the money which he asked for, all the money which he expected, all the money which upon his own judgment his services entitled him to, all that the Government could afford to pay, for it paid a Secretary of the Treasury and a Secretary of State their full salary.

It is said that this case went before the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims decided that he was entitled to this money. What did the Court of Claims know about it? I have heard it argued that we referred it to the Court of Claims and we ought to be bound by their adjudication. Not at all; we never agreed to be bound by their adjudication at that time, as the court was then constituted. We sent it to them to get facts and to report a decision, requiring their decision to come here for confirmation or for rejection, as the case might be. We never did agree to refer it to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims did decide, however, that he was entitled to certain money. What money? The money provided for in this bill? By no manner of means. The Court of Claims decided that he was entitled to the pay of chief clerk because he was chief clerk, and that he was entitled to the pay of Secretary of State because he sat in the place of the Secretary of State, the double compensation of the two offices. You cannot quote the authority of the Court of Claims. You set your heel on it as you ought to do. There was never any law in it. The Committee on Claims all of them reject it as authority. Whatever the opinion of Mr. Blackford and his associates is worth, you may receive it as such, but not as authority. It is not authority.

Mr. PRATT. If the Senator will allow me, I will adduce another authority right in this connection, which has not been brought before the Senate at all. It is the authority of the First Auditor in the Treasury Department, his certificate dated August 11, 1849, in which he certifies that he has "examined and adjusted the account between the United States and Asbury Dickins," and finds "that the sum of $3,976.19 is due from the United States to said Dickins for his salary as acting Secretary of the Treasury, acting Secretary of State, and chief clerk of the Treasury Department, under previous decisions of the First Comptroller and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows," and then he gives the particulars. This is dated August 11, 1849.

Mr. HOWE. Why was it not paid?

Mr. PRATT. It was not paid at that time because there was no appropriation applicable to it.

Mr. HOWE. O, there was plenty of appropriation. These officers had lots of money under appropriations for all your civil service rendered in pursuance of law. This Auditor was put there for the very purpose of adjusting all these accounts. There was money in the Treasury to pay them. That is not the reason. That decision was undoubtedly overruled by the Comptroller, or he revoked it—one of the two. It was not paid, simply because somebody who stood between the Auditor and the Treasury said that that decision was not just, was not right.

Mr. President, a decision of Judge Taney's has been cited here. It was cited, I noticed, several times yesterday as a judgment rendered in the Supreme Court of the United States. I had an indistinct recollection of the case. My impression was that it was not a judgment rendered in the Supreme Court of the United States, but was rendered by the circuit judge of the Maryland circuit. Upon looking for the case this morning I find that my impression was correct. It was rendered by Judge Taney in the circuit court. What was the case? A Navy agent was sued for a balance due the Treasury. He filed a set-off, and among the items in his bill of particulars was a salary which he claimed while he performed the office of acting purser of the Navy. What did Judge Taney say about that? Three things. First, that the law authorized, or did not forbid a man to hold two offices. In that he was right. Second, that the Secretary of the Navy had authority—he does not say what it was—but he had authority to appoint not merely pursers, but acting pursers where there was a public exigency calling for them. Third, that there was an exigency calling for the appointment of an acting purser at Annapolis, and that he appointed this man White acting purser, and the law, Taney said, affixed the salary of $1,500 for the services of a purser or an acting purser; and therefore since White held the office of Navy agent by a regular appointment, and held the office of acting purser by a regular appointment, and since the law appended to the office of Navy agent a certain salary and to the office of acting purser another salary, he was entitled to the pay of the acting purser. There is no analogy between that case and this. Nobody but White was paid for doing the duties of an acting purser at Annapolis; all your pursers were employed on other duty; somebody must be appointed outside, some new man must be appointed acting purser; this man was appointed. He held two offices; so Taney said.

Mr. MITCHELL. If it will not interrupt the Senator I should like to ask a question.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume the President of the United States had the power under the act of 1792 to have appointed a Secretary of the Treasury ad interim who was not chief clerk. Could he not do that?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose he had done so and that person had performed the service, would he have been entitled to pay?

Mr. HOWE. That question is pertinent. If the President had called upon my friend from Oregon to perform the duties of Secretary of State while the Secretary of State was absent, the Senator could have accepted that commission or declined it, as he pleased.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose I had accepted and rendered the service?

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator had accepted he would have had fair ground for asking compensation; but he could point to no law which called on the Treasury to make compensation. Congress could have awarded him pay as Congress can award pay in this case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under the principles of the common law would I not have been entitled legally to my pay for the services rendered?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; not to a dime legally, simply because there was but one law which provided for a Secretary of the Treasury or Secretary of State, and that office was filled, and there was but one sum of money awarded by law to pay for those services, and another man got that money who was entitled to it.

Mr. PRATT. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury was dead at the time, and his office was vacant and this appointment was made ad interim?

Mr. HOWE. Then it would be under entirely a different law.

Mr. PRATT. This law of 1792 provides for three cases: first, the Secretary being dead; or second, absent from his post of duty; or third, sick.

Mr. HOWE. The Constitution having said to the President that in case of vacancy, which would be that case, the Secretary having died, "You shall appoint a Secretary," and the law having said, "You can designate a person in that identical case," I do not know but that the President could have disregarded the Constitution and acted under the law. Instead of filling the vacancy as the Constitution called on him to do, possibly he might have turned his back on the Constitution and have designated some outside person to act like a Secretary under the statute. That case, I take it, never has occurred. I guess while we remain here it never will occur. When the office is vacant I guess it will be filled just as the Constitution requires that it shall be filled. But, Mr. President, I have not got through with replying to my friend from Oregon.

The case he suggested is not this case. I said in that case the man who was drawn from his usual avocations which he pursued for his own profit to act like a Secretary of State or like a Secretary of the Treasury might have an equitable ground for some compensation, not for the salary which the law attaches to the office of Secretary of State or Secretary of the Treasury, but for some compensation; and Congress would undoubtedly in such a case award such compensation as the man was entitled to for sitting in the chair of the Secretary and doing such clerical duties as might be performed under those circumstances.

Mr. MITCHELL. And in that event two persons would be paid as Secretary of the Treasury at the same time.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I cannot see why.

Mr. HOWE. One person would be paid as Secretary of the Treasury; another person would be paid by a special appropriation made by Congress for sitting in the chair of the Secretary of the Treasury acting like one while he was gone and while there was no need for one—not paid the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury, but paid so much as his services were worth. This man was paid that sum. How? By being relieved from the ordinary duties of a chief clerk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all. The evidence shows that he performed both, and that he sat up when he ought to have been in bed in order to be able to perform the duties of both.

Mr. HOWE. That is a feature in the case which has just come to my attention.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the evidence.

Mr. HOWE. That is the evidence, is it, that he sat up nights to discharge the duties both of chief clerk and of Secretary of the Treasury? I am requested to ask how it was about Sundays? Sir, neither the duty of a chief clerk nor the duty of a Secretary of the Treasury is one that can very well be discharged——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 1393.

Mr. ANTHONY. The question that is now under consideration relates to the Calendar, which is made the order for to-day, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be allowed to go on with his remarks. I understand that he would prefer to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill which was under consideration at the expiration of the morning hour?

Mr. SARGENT. If we could have a vote without further discussion on the bill, I would not object; but we have already occupied a good many days upon it, much more than its importance would seem to justify, and we are making good progress with the Calendar, and I think we had better proceed with it.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is one of the bills that came up on the Calendar and passed in its regular order, but the Senator from Wisconsin entered a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SARGENT. I know it comes up on a motion to reconsider, but not regularly on the Calendar. The motion to reconsider, I suppose, carries it to its appropriate place on the Calendar. I think we had better proceed with the Calendar unless we can have a vote on the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are several bills on the Calendar, I think, that will give rise to considerable discussion, and we have not passed over bills because they required discussion, but only passed them over by vote. I think we had better go on with this matter for the dispatch of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. SARGENT. Can it be proceeded with subject to objection by and by?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I shall have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California objects. The first bill on the Calendar will be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. Where does this motion to reconsider stand on the Calendar? It attaches to the bill, does it not? The motion to reconsider belongs to the bill when the bill comes up. It does not go to the foot of the Calendar, does it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. If objection is made, and the Chair understands the Senator from California to object, the unfinished business is House bill No. 1393.

Mr. HOWE. Let me appeal to my friend from California to withdraw his objection until I get through with my remarks, which will be in the course of ten minutes.

Mr. SARGENT. At the personal request of the Senator, for that purpose, I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOWE. I suspect that I am occupying more time than I had any intention of occupying. I did not mean so much to discuss the question of law or the question of justice involved here as to call the attention of the Senate to another consideration. I think (and I hope the Senate will allow me to so say in all frankness) the Senate owes some consideration in cases of this kind to the action of the Committee on Claims. The Senate knows that I have served a very long time on that committee. I am no longer upon it. The things that I am about to say I can say now without having any personal interest in them. I have reason to thank my God every day for that sparing mercy which has saved me from the further infliction of the very disagreeable duties discharged by that committee. But, sir, the solemn fact is this: that committee is constituted of very able men, very honest men, very just men; they have to struggle hand to hand with these claimants; they have to stifle their own sympathies, their own generous and charitable impulses, every day in order to do justice to the Treasury, to the Government, and to the people of the United States; and when they have crucified their own better impulses, their own generous instincts, in order to be just and to be honest, and have come in here with a report, especially a report adverse to a claimant, the Senate should have good, sound, tangible grounds for overruling the decision of that committee. I do not find those grounds in this case. It is a sort of reflection upon the committee. When the Senate voted that this money is due to these claimants from the Treasury, it struck me yesterday—and it was that consideration which emboldened me to move the reconsideration—it sounded like a judgment of the Senate that the majority of your Committee on Claims are deaf to the appeals of justice, even when presented and urged by the heirs of such a man as Asbury Dickins. That is a judgment which this Senate does not mean to pronounce and ought not to pronounce. I know the majority of this committee have as much sympathy, as much kindness, and as much generosity as any one of us.

I have no doubt these claimants are individually very deserving. What is the sum that you propose to award? Thirty-one hundred dollars or thereabouts. If they are really needy let us pay them $3,100. We can contribute it out of our own pockets. I will join with my friends on the other side and make up that sum any day, in the morning before breakfast, or in the evening after dinner. That sum is very easily made up. You will thus satisfy your charitable inclinations, you will satisfy their claim, you will save the Treasury from a precedent which I think is altogether unsafe, and you will save the feelings of your Committee on Claims. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MITCHELL. Inasmuch as so much has been said in regard to this matter, and in view of the fact that the minority report has never been read, I now call for the reading of that report.

Mr. SARGENT. I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California calls for the regular order, which is now before the Senate.

TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1393) providing for the assignment of judges in the Territories.

Mr. WRIGHT. Inasmuch as objection has been developed to this bill which was not expected, especially on the part of the committee, I trust it will be acceptable to our friends on the other side if I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to recommit the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not make any objection, but I ask that an amendment which I have proposed to the original bill may accompany it back to the committee and may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the proposed amendment will also be referred to that committee and ordered to be printed.

PLACERVILLE AND SACRAMENTO VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 971) to forfeit to the United States certain lands granted to the Placerville and Sacramento Valley Railroad Company, to aid in constructing a railroad from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville, in the State of California; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to declare forfeited to the United States all lands which were granted by Congress in the year 1866 to the Placerville and Sacramento Valley Railroad Company, to aid in constructing a railroad from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville, in the State of California, and which have not been patented by the United States to the company under that grant, which has expired by limitation, and these lands are hereafter to be disposed of as other public lands of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD H. DUTTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1574) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont, in his account as such postmaster, with $128.68, being the amount of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of the post-office by burglars on the night of the 21st of October, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a report from the House adopted by the Senate committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be read, if it is short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that this is an ordinary case of this sort, and I withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH R. BLACKWELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois, in his account as postmaster, with the sum of $535.85, being the amount of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and money stolen from the safe of the post-office by burglars on the night of the 13th of August, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster.

Mr. PRATT. Let the report be read in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made to the House of Representatives by Mr. J. B. HAWLEY on the 16th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois, present the following report:

It appears from the evidence in this case that, on the night of August 13, 1873, the post-office at Litchfield, Illinois, was broken and entered by burglars, who forced open the iron safe in which the money and postage-stamps and stamped envelopes belonging to the Government were kept, and stole therefrom stamps and stamped envelopes to the value of $482.19, and money-order funds to the amount of $53.85. It appears from the statements of a special agent of the Post-Office Department, made in his report of this case to the Post-Office Department, under date of August 22, 1873, that he had thoroughly examined it; that the amount of postage-stamps and money-order funds above mentioned was stolen from the safe of the post-office, and without any fault or neglect of the postmaster. In a letter of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, dated January 7, 1874, that officer estimates the probable amount of stamps and stamped envelopes on hand at the post-office at Litchfield, Illinois, August 13, 1873, at $675.84.

The committee find that Joseph R. Blackwell was postmaster at said office at the time of said burglary, and recommend the passage of bill H. R. No. 676 for his relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2875) authorizing the use of certain evidence;

A bill (H. R. No. 2876) to amend the coinage act of 1873; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2878) to amend the twenty-fifth section of the coinage act of 1873.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 310) for the relief of W. W. Elliott;

A bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry C. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana;

A bill (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey;

A bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad in Wisconsin; and

A bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith.

ERRORS IN PRIZE-LISTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists, the consideration of which was resumed by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments heretofore made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANS OF NORTHERN SUPERINTENDENCY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 154) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency," approved June 10, 1872.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be laid aside.

PASSAIC COUNTY NATIONAL BANK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1892) authorizing the Passaic County National Bank of Paterson to change its name; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the name of the Passaic County National Bank of Paterson shall be changed to the Second National Bank of Paterson whenever the board of directors of the bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency; but such acceptance is to be made within six months after the passage of the act; and all expenses of such change, including that of printing and engraving, are to be paid by the bank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN TUG NOAH P. SPRAGUE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 541) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague; which was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the American-built Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague, owned by Edward Evans, of North Towanda, Niagara County, New York, the tug having been rebuilt in the city of Buffalo, in that State.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair) subsequently said: The Chair will take the liberty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill (S. No. 541) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague is identical with House bill No. 519, of the same title, that has already passed the House of Representatives and is recommended favorably by the Committee on Commerce, to which it was referred. The Chair will therefore ask unanimous consent of the Senate to the substitution of the House bill for the bill that has already been passed by the Senate. If there be no objection, the Chair will take that to be the pleasure of the Senate, and the House bill will be considered as passed.

BUTLER, MILLER & CO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 542) for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co., of Ohio.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the report in that case.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. PRATT from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. The Secretary has read far enough I think to enable us to infer that this bill is like two or three others which have been postponed in order that they may be considered together. I suggest that this go with them.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understand this bill is not a bill for damage done in war, but for actual property taken and used.

Mr. CONKLING. So I understand, and so the other bills were.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be laid aside.

BEDS OF UNSURVEYED LAKES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 281) ceding to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of unsurveyed lakes and other bodies of water; which was read.

Mr. CONKLING. From what committee does that bill come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONKLING. Who reported it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. PRATT. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

A MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 440) to amend the act entitled "An act transferring the control of certain territorial penitentiaries to the several Territories in which the same are located," approved January 24, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2541) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Arkansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 2880) to enable William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for an improved bullet-machine; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2787) to provide for the sale of the present United States marine hospital and site and the purchase of a new site and erection thereon of a new marine hospital in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Railroads is not in his seat.

Mr. SARGENT. I have just sent him word that this bill was likely to come up.

Mr. SCOTT. While the bill is being read the chairman will come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment reported by the Committee on Railroads, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert a substitute.

Before the reading was concluded,

Mr. SAULSBURY. This is a bill of too much importance to be taken up here without proper consideration. It is a provision for railroads throughout all the Territories of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside, objection being made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Delaware will permit me, I will suggest an amendment which I think will remove all difficulties. Let a provision be inserted that it shall have no application except in places that are deficient in railroads, and providing that they shall be removed from those States that have an excess. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. The next bill on the Calendar will be read, the Senator from Delaware objecting to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. STEWART. I move to postpone all other orders for the purpose of considering this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. STEWART. And I wish to say one word before the vote is taken, in order to discharge my duty, and then the Senate can do as it pleases. In the Territories they undertook to build railroads under territorial legislative acts. Many of the acts are very irregular; some of them authorizing counties to render local aid——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks this debate is out of order.

Mr. STEWART. Just one word of explanation. Great confusion now exists. This bill has been under consideration for two sessions; it has been twice considered by the Committee on Railroads, and twice considered by the Committee on Public Lands. Attention has been invited to it on all hands.

The only objection to it now is that it is rather restrictive in its provisions. It provides a general incorporation law for the Territories that will save great confusion and prevent them becoming unnecessarily involved in debt. This cuts all that off. I believe it is a bill that ought to be considered and that this is the proper time to consider it. There has been a great deal of labor bestowed on it. I therefore move to postpone all other orders and take up this bill. I think if the Senate will pay attention to it, they will all approve it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Railroads to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and insert the following substitute:

That any number of natural persons not less than five may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory, with all the rights, privileges, and powers conferred by, and subject to all the restrictions of, this act.

SEC. 2. That any number of persons as aforesaid, associating to form a corporation for the purposes named in the first section of this act, shall, under their hands and seals, make a certificate which shall specify as follows: First, the name of such corporation, by which it shall be known; secondly, the name of the county or counties and Territory or Territories where the termini of said road are to be located, and the county or counties and Territory or Territories through which such road shall pass, and the general route of said road; thirdly, the amount of capital stock necessary to construct such road, which amount so specified shall not be increased without the consent of Congress. Such certificate shall be acknowledged before the judge of a territorial court of record, and certified to under seal by the clerk of said court; and a duly certified copy of such certificate shall be filed with the secretary of each and every Territory within or through which the line of road as described in the certificate will pass, and the original shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior. A copy of said certificate, duly certified by the Secretary of the Interior under the seal of the Department, shall be evidence of the existence of such corporation.

SEC. 3. That when the foregoing provisions have been complied with, the persons named as corporators in said certificate are hereby authorized to carry into effect the objects named in said certificate, in accordance with the provisions of this act; and they and their associates, successors, and assigns, by the name and style provided in said certificate, shall thereafter be deemed a body-corporate, with right of succession, with power to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, contract and be contracted with, acquire and convey such real and personal estate as may be convenient and necessary to carry into effect the objects of the incorporation, to make and use a common seal, and the same to alter at pleasure, and do all needful acts to carry into effect the objects for which it was created; and it shall possess all the powers and be subject to all rules and restrictions provided by this act; and the charter of such corporation shall be limited to fifty years from the date of its certificate.

SEC. 4. That such corporations shall be authorized to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a railroad, with a single or double track, with such side-tracks, turnouts, machine-shops, offices, and depots as they may deem necessary, between any points they may select upon the designated line of such road.

SEC. 5. That the capital stock of such corporation shall consist of such sum as may be named in the certificate; and the shares of stock shall be regarded as personal property, and shall be subject to execution at law. An installment of 10 per cent. on each share shall be paid in money at the time of making the subscription, and the residue thereof shall be paid in such installments, not exceeding 10 per cent. on each share of stock, as the directors may prescribe; which installments shall not be called for more frequently than once in three months, and shall be payable at the principal office of the corporation to such person or persons as may be designated by the directors.

SEC. 6. That if any installment of stock shall remain unpaid for sixty days after the time specified for payment thereon, whether such stock is held by the original subscriber, or his assignee, trustee, successor in interest, or purchaser under the provisions of this section, the same may be collected by an action at law, or the directors may sell the stock so unpaid at public auction for the installment then due thereon, first giving thirty days' public notice of the time and place of sale in some newspaper in general circulation in the Territory where the principal office of the corporation is located, and by written notice sent by mail within five days after default made to each stockholder who is in default, and whose name appears upon the books of the corporation, directed to him at his address as last reported by him to the secretary of the corporation; and if any residue of money shall remain after paying the amount due on said stock, the same shall, on demand, be paid over to the former owner.

SEC. 7. That the persons named in said certificate of incorporation, or a majority of them, shall be authorized to order books to be opened for receiving subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation, at such time or times, and at such place or places, as they may deem expedient, after having given at least thirty days' notice, in a newspaper of general circulation in each Territory through or within which such road will pass, of the time and place of opening books; and as soon as 10 per cent. on the capital stock shall be subscribed and paid, they may give like notice for the stockholders to meet at such time and place as they may designate, for the purpose of choosing five or more directors, who shall continue in office until the time fixed for the annual election, which time shall be within six months from the date when such directors were chosen, and until their successors are chosen and qualified. At the time and place appointed directors shall be chosen by ballot by such of the stockholders as shall attend for that purpose, either in person or by lawful proxies in writing; each share shall entitle the owner to one vote, and a majority of votes cast shall be necessary for a choice; but, after the first election of directors, no person shall vote on any share on which any installment is in default by reason of the non-payment thereof, after the expiration of the thirty days' notice of sale hereinbefore provided for. The persons named in such certificate, or such of them as may be present, shall be inspectors of such election, and shall certify what persons are elected directors, and appoint the time and place for holding their first meeting; a majority of said directors shall form a board, and be competent to fill vacancies in their board, make by-laws, and transact all business of the corporation. A new election shall be annually held for directors, at such time and place as the stockholders at their first meeting shall determine or as the by-laws of the corporation may require; and the directors chosen at any election shall, so soon thereafter as may be convenient, choose one of their number to be president, and shall appoint a secretary and a treasurer of the corporation. The directors, before entering upon their duties, shall each take an oath or affirmation faithfully to discharge his duties; and they may, from time to time, make such dividends of the actual net profits of said corporation as they may think proper, and shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified.

SEC. 8. That the right of way through the public lands is hereby granted to any railroad corporation incorporated under this act to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the center of such railroad; and the right and authority are hereby given to such corporation to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material of earth, stone, timber, and water necessary for the construction and maintenance thereof; and ground for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations is hereby granted to such corporation, not to exceed forty acres for every ten miles of road.

SEC. 9. That for the purpose of securing private lands and premises on the line of such road, which may be necessary and proper for the construction thereof, such corporation be, and is hereby, empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for the construction and working of said road, not exceeding in width one hundred feet on each side of its center line, unless a greater width be required for the purpose of excavation or embankment; and also any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for turnouts, standing places for cars, depots, station-houses, or any other structures required in the construction and operating of said road; and such corporation shall have the right to cut and remove trees or other material that might, by falling, incumber its road-bed, though standing or being more than one hundred feet therefrom; and in case the owner or claimant of such lands or premises and such corporation cannot agree as to the damages, the amount shall be determined by the appraisal of three disinterested commissioners, who shall be appointed upon application by any party to the territorial district court, or the judge thereof, in the district in which the lands or premises to be taken lie; and said commissioners, in their assessments of damages, shall appraise such premises at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built; and upon return into court of such appraisement, and upon the payment to the clerk thereof of the amount so awarded by the commissioners for the use and benefit of the owner thereof, said premises shall be deemed to be taken by said corporation, which shall thereby acquire full title to the same for the purposes aforesaid; and either party feeling aggrieved by said assessment may, within thirty days, file an appeal therefrom, and demand a jury of twelve men to estimate the damage sustained; but such appeal shall not interfere with the rights of said corporation, after having paid to the clerk the amount of the award or given such security as the court may prescribe, to enter upon the premises taken, or to do any act necessary in the construction of its road; and said party appealing shall give bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties, for the payment of any costs that may arise upon such appeal; and in case the party appealing does not obtain a more favorable verdict, such party shall pay the whole cost incurred by both parties. And the payment into court, for the use of the owner or claimant, of a sum equal to that finally awarded shall be held to vest in said corporation the title of said land, and the right to use and occupy the same for the construction, maintaining, and operating of the road of said corporation. And if the lands to be taken as aforesaid shall be held by a person residing without the Territory or subject to any legal disability, the court may appoint a proper person, who shall give bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties, for the faithful execution of his trust, and who may represent in court the person disqualified or absent as aforesaid, when the same proceeding shall be had in reference to the appraisement of the premises to be taken, and with the same effect as has been already described. And the title of the corporation to the lands taken by virtue of this act shall not be affected nor impaired by reason of any failure by any guardian to discharge faithfully his trust. And in case it shall be necessary for such corporation to enter upon any lands which are unoccupied, and of which there is no apparent owner or claimant, it may proceed to take and use the same for the purpose of its said railroad, and may institute proceedings, in manner described, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of, and acquiring a title to, the same; and the court may determine the kind of notice to be served on such owner or owners, and may, in its discretion, appoint an agent or guardian to represent such owner or owners in case of his or their incapacity or non-appearance. But in case no claimant shall appear within six years from the time of the opening of said road across any land, all claim to damages against said corporation shall be barred.

SEC. 10. That any such corporation whose right of way, or whose track upon such right of way, extends through any cañon, pass, or defile, shall not exclude any other such corporation from a passage through the same upon equitable terms; and in case of disagreement, upon application of either of the parties, the same shall be adjusted by the Secretary of the Interior, after hearing, upon reasonable notice to the parties, whose decision may be enforced by a court of competent jurisdiction; and if the passage of any such railroad through any cañon, pass, or defile causes the disuse or change of location of any public wagon-road, damages shall be awarded therefor as provided by this act.

SEC. 11. That every railroad corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be required to commence operations on the line of its road within one year from the filing of its certificate with the Secretary of the Interior, and thereafter to grade at least ten miles each year, and to complete the whole line of its road within ten years from the date of the filing of said certificate; and if it shall fail to comply with any of the requirements of this section it shall forfeit its charter and all the rights and privileges conferred by this act as to any uncompleted portion of its line of road. Upon the written application of any party interested, made to the Secretary of the Interior, setting forth the alleged cause of such forfeiture, it shall be the duty of the Secretary, after notice to the corporation, to examine the case; and if, in his judgment, sufficient cause exists for such forfeiture, he shall notify the Attorney-General of the United States; whereupon it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General, or of the United States district attorney of any Territory in which any part of the line of said road is situated, to commence proceedings to enforce the forfeiture.

SEC. 12. That whenever any corporation organized under this act shall find it necessary, for the purpose of avoiding dangerous or difficult curves or grades, or unsafe or unsubstantial grounds or foundations, to change the location or grade of any portions of its road, such railroad corporation is hereby authorized, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, to make such changes, not departing from the general route prescribed in the certificate of such corporation; and for the purpose of making such change as aforesaid such corporation shall have all the rights, powers, and privileges granted by sections 8 and 9 of this act.

SEC. 13. That any corporation organized under this act shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the corporation to an amount not exceeding its authorized capital stock, at a rate of interest to be agreed upon by the respective parties, and may execute bonds therefor in sums of not less than $100, and secure the payment thereof by mortgage or pledge of the property and income of such corporation.

SEC. 14. That such corporation may acquire, by purchase or gift, any lands in the vicinity of its road, or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way, or such as may be donated to aid in the construction of such road, and convey the same in such manner as the directors may prescribe; and all deeds and conveyances made by such corporation shall be signed by the president under the seal of the corporation.

SEC. 15. That it shall be lawful for such corporation, whenever it may be necessary, in the construction of such road, to cross any road or stream of water, to divert the same from its location or bed; but such corporation shall, without unnecessary delay, place such road or stream in such condition as not to impair its former usefulness, and shall pay any damages to private property resulting therefrom, the amount to be ascertained as provided in section 9 of this act. And in case it shall become necessary and proper for any such railroad corporation to build a bridge on the line of its road over a navigable stream, said bridge shall be built under and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of the stream as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and such bridge shall be at all times so kept and managed as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels; and such bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War; and such bridge shall be known and recognized as a post-route, upon which, also, no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops and munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge. Should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and all changes in the construction or any alteration of said bridge that may be directed at any time by Congress shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners thereof; and in case of any litigation or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river the cause may be tried before the district court of the Territory in or opposite to which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be; and all railroad companies desiring to use any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the use of the same and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof, and of all the approaches thereto, under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in case they shall not agree.

SEC. 16. That such corporation shall, as soon as convenient after its organization, establish a principal office at some point on the line of its road, and may change the same at pleasure to any other point on said road, giving public notice in one or more newspapers in the Territory having the largest circulation and notice to the Secretary of the Interior of such establishment or change.

SEC. 17. That each and every railroad corporation incorporated under this act shall annually, in the month of January, make a full report, under the oath of the president and treasurer of said corporation, of the condition of its affairs to the Secretary of the Interior, showing the amount of the capital stock of such company subscribed and the amount actually paid in; the gross amount of receipts, and the respective resources thereof, during the previous year; the amount of road graded, the amount constructed, the cost of construction per mile, and of repairs and incidental expenses; the net amount of profits, the dividends made, and the debts and liabilities, with such other facts as may be necessary to a full statement of the affairs and condition of such road.

SEC. 18. That any railroad corporation heretofore organized under the acts of the Legislature of any Territory shall, upon filing with the Secretary of the Interior its original articles of incorporation, or a certified copy thereof, and its acceptance of this act, be recognized from and after the date of such acceptance for all the objects and purposes of this act, and shall be entitled to all the privileges and benefits and shall be subject to all the restrictions herein granted or imposed.

SEC. 19. That any corporation under this act is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a telegraph on the line of its road. The provisions of this act concerning the grant for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations shall not apply to mineral lands of the United States, nor to any lands reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, nor to lands upon which any homestead or pre-emption claims may exist at the time of filing the certificate of incorporation under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 20. That nothing in this act shall be construed to make the United States responsible for any debts or obligations of any character which may be contracted by such corporations. And it shall not be lawful, without the consent of Congress, for any Territory, or any county or municipal corporation within any Territory, to subscribe to the stock of any corporation authorized by this act, or that may accept its terms, or in any manner to loan its credit to such corporation. Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of such corporations, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

SEC. 21. That the right of way through the unoccupied public lands of the United States in any State is hereby granted to any railroad corporation incorporated under the laws of such State to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the center of such railroad; and the right and authority are hereby given to such corporation to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material of earth, stone, timber, and water for the construction and maintenance thereof; and ground for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations is hereby granted to such of said corporations as have not received aid in lands or bonds from the United States, not to exceed forty acres for each ten miles of road hereafter to be constructed, subject to the restrictions of section 19 of this act.

Mr. STEWART. The object of this bill is to afford an opportunity for persons residing in the Territories who desire to build railroads on their own money and for their own use to do so without the necessity of going to a territorial Legislature or to Congress to ask that privilege.

The territorial Legislatures in legislating on this subject passed some laws that Congress thought so objectionable that a few years ago an act was passed prohibiting the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories from passing any more laws in regard to it. Some years later it was modified so as to legalize those acts to some extent. It was alleged as against those laws that they gave extensive privileges which monopolized cañons and defiles where roads must necessarily go to companies having no legitimate basis and having invested no funds. After Congress passed the prohibitory law, those desiring to build railroads in the Territories and those desiring to sell charters for railroads to somebody else to build came to Congress; and during the last Congress there were several hundred bills introduced granting privileges to individuals to build railroads with all sorts of provisions. They were scattered around through the various committees of both Houses. Some of them passed. Now the Committee on Railroads has undertaken to revise and digest the system of general railroad laws that have been adopted in the States and to select such portions of those laws as they thought proper. It was at the last session referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That committee reported it twice and had it re-referred for further examination, and at this session it was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and we have gone through it again. It has been examined by the lawyers who happen to be on each of those committees as carefully as it could be, and I think we have come as near as we can to getting a railroad bill that will allow persons who desire to build railroads on their own money to do so without being blackmailed. We have made it as difficult as we could for speculative or kiting operations. We have required bona fide capital to be paid in, we have required bona fide work to be done yearly, and we have accompanied it step by step with such limitations as we thought would bring it within the principles of square dealing.

Now, that we need general legislation on this subject, and should be relieved from special bills, is evident. There are many cases in the Territories where persons desire to build railroads for the purpose of opening mines, and they cannot afford to be taxed for procuring special legislation, nor will Congress give sufficient attention to special legislation to see that justice is done to the Government, to the Territories, and to individuals. Special bills are exceedingly dangerous.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Nevada what he means by railway companies being taxed for special legislation? When for an enterprise so beneficial to a community as railroads are now understood and confessed to be, individuals make application to the local Legislature for the franchise of building a road and for an act declaring a number of individuals a body-corporate, what can be the tax to which they are subjected?

Mr. STEWART. I will explain to the Senator exactly what I mean by a tax. As will be seen by the records of the Senate, not to go further, by looking at a number of bills introduced here, the persons making the application are not the parties who intend to build the road; but wherever you see a mining camp, wherever you see a place where a railroad will be likely to be required, somebody comes to get a charter by special legislation, and those who do seek to fix that charter so that they will hold it themselves; they will lobby for it, and it requires watchfulness here to prevent their getting it through, especially where they can hold it for years over those who really desire to build roads. The expense of coming here, several hundred miles, and spending months before legislation can be had to enable a company to build a road is something of a tax.

Mr. BAYARD. Why should they come to Congress for acts of incorporation? Has not the territorial Legislature the right to grant such franchises?

Mr. STEWART. Congress has prohibited the territorial Legislatures from enacting these laws, and very properly too; for the territorial legislation has been very improvident and inexpedient. I know some cases—I do not care about enumerating them—where counties have been entirely bankrupted by territorial legislation. I know of other cases where enterprises have been kept back by improvident franchises being granted. There is no reason why persons who put up bona fide capital—and this does not allow anything else—and who wish to build a road on their own money, should have to get special legislation. Special legislation is always to be avoided where you can accomplish the purpose by general legislation.

This bill may not be the wisest that can be devised; but it is the best that two committees after two sessions of investigation have been able to get up. It prohibits, without the consent of Congress, any aid from Territories or counties to railroads, which is very proper. It provides for a system of condemning private property for public use, adopting the best system known, and putting it under the jurisdiction of the highest courts in the Territories. Many States have put this jurisdiction in probate courts or in boards of supervisors; a very irregular way, by which private property was liable to be confiscated by railroads. This provides a system of condemning private property in the way that is most approved by the States having the largest experience. The acts have been examined, and the jurisdiction is placed where it will protect all parties. So on throughout. The bill grants the right of way simply. There is no grant of lands except for stations and depots and the right of way over the public lands. This is the minimum of what is in any bill that has been proposed to Congress. It is a bill under which there can be no speculation in getting charters to sell out. Nobody will want a charter under this bill unless he intends to put his own money in to build a road.

I could go through in detail the different provisions. The more this bill is studied, the better I would like it. I see the absolute necessity of general legislation, and this session is probably better than any other for it, because there is less pressure here now, and it is time to give them a general law, and let the parties who want to build railroads in the Territories understand that they must build them with their own money; and they are not allowed to borrow any money beyond their capital stock, and are not allowed to water their capital stock by fictitious increases. These provisions are in the bill. I think it can be well trusted as a bill that will answer the purposes intended.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know that I am opposed to the general purpose of this bill; but I think it is a measure of such importance that the atteniton of the Senate should be called to some matters in connection with it. I have no amendment to suggest, but I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to some of the objections to the bill which occur to me. The bill has just been read here, and this is the first time I have had my attention directed to it. I am not certain that the points which occur to me are well taken, but nevertheless I beg to call the attention of the chairman of the Railroad Committee to them.

Mr. STEWART. Now that the bill has been read and attention called to it particularly, I would prefer that we should have some day set for its consideration, if Senators desire to consider it further, because I want to get the views of everybody upon it and to get it as perfect as I can, as it is a very important bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us go on with it now.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I should like to have it disposed of now.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to call attention to the fact that, as I understand the bill, it is provided that not only the right of way of one hundred feet in width, but forty acres of land for every ten miles can be condemned and the title vested absolutely in the company.

Mr. STEWART. No; that is not it. They can have not exceeding forty acres for every ten miles for depot and side-track purposes where the road goes through the public land, where it is free from reserve or pre-emption. They can only condemn what is absolutely necessary for the right of way.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to direct attention to the point I was referring to.

I read from section 9, page 21:

That for the purpose of securing private lands and premises on the line of such road which may be necessary and proper for the construction thereof, such corporation be, and is hereby, empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for the construction and working of said road, &c.

That is under an agreement between the parties. I read now from line 16:

And in case the owner or claimant of such lands or premises and such corporation cannot agree as to damages, the amount shall be determined by the appraisal of three disinterested commissioners, who shall be appointed upon application by any party to the territorial district court, or the judge thereof, in the district in which the lands or premises to be taken lie.

The prior part of the section refers to the taking of land by agreement, and points out the purposes and objects for which the land can be taken; that is, for the road-bed and also for turnouts and for depot grounds, as I understand. But if they cannot agree, then the lands are to be appraised by persons appointed by the district judge.

And said commissioners, in their assessments of damages, shall appraise such premises at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built.

I have very great question of that as a rule of damages; but waiving that—

And upon return into court of such appraisement, and upon the payment to the clerk thereof of the amount so awarded by the commissioners for the use and benefit of the owner thereof, said premises shall be deemed to be taken by said corporation, which shall thereby acquire full title to the same for the purposes aforesaid.

Now they acquire full title to these premises, not a mere easement; and therefore if the road shall be abandoned at any time, the title is gone from the parties, as I shall show from another part of this section. The company do not acquire a mere easement over the land for the purposes indicated, but they acquire a full title.

And either party feeling aggrieved by said assessment may, within thirty days, file an appeal therefrom, and demand a jury of twelve men to estimate the damage sustained; but such appeal shall not interfere with the rights of said corporation, after having paid to the clerk the amount of the award or given such security as the court may prescribe—

That is to say, after they have paid the money the title becomes absolute in the railroad company, whatever may be the result of the appeal in the court to which the case may be taken.

And said party appealing shall give bonds, &c. And the payment into court, for the use of the owner or claimant, of a sum equal to that finally awarded shall be held to vest in said corporation the title of said land—

It vests in them the absolute title of said land—

And the right to use and occupy the same for the construction, maintaining, and operating of the road of said corporation.

Not merely the right to use and occupy it for that purpose, but it vests in them the title to the lands. Then it goes on and says:

And if the lands to be taken as aforesaid shall be held by a person residing without the Territory or subject to any legal disability, the court may appoint a proper person, who shall give bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties, for the faithful execution of his trust, and who may represent in court the person disqualified or absent as aforesaid, when the same proceeding shall be had in reference to the appraisement of the premises to be taken, and with the same effect as has been already described.

It occurs to me that under this section, if the owner is a non-resident, without notice to him, they can appoint some person to act for him and thus sequester his estate and vest the title in the railroad company—not the mere easement, but the absolute title—and that too after they have entered upon the work merely and have had a condemnation. The title at once vests on the payment of the money; and though the road should be abandoned the next day, the title is absolute in the railroad company. Certainly it was not the intention of the committee to do this thing, and yet that is what they have done, as it seems to me from this language. It is certainly a most objectionable thing, that if I happen to be a non-resident of the Territory, you can go to work and condemn my land by appointing some person to act for me and without notice to me. I never heard of such a proceeding before. You provide in another place in this bill that after six years from the time of the judgment of condemnation there shall be no application to set it aside; and so, though the owner may be a minor only one year old, if his land is thus condemned, and six years elapse, his title is gone.

Now I wish to call attention to another thing.

Mr. STEWART. Before you leave that point I wish to say one word.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I am mistaken in this, I shall be very glad to have it pointed out.

Mr. STEWART. This is a proceeding in rem. to get the right of way for a railroad, and if a child six years old owns land on that right of way, I do not suppose the Senator will think it necessary to wait fifteen years for the child to come of age before you can build the railroad. I never heard of such a proposition as that. It seems to me that would not be right. They must go right along and build the road at that time, and the provision is that they shall pay for the land before they have it. They are to have it for the purpose of a right of way and the use of the railroad, when they pay for it, and not until then. I believe that is according to the Constitution, that it shall be paid for before it is taken.

Now what is it that may be condemned in this way by the court?

That for the purpose of securing private lands and premises on the line of such road, which may be necessary and proper for the construction thereof, such corporation be, and is hereby, empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for the construction and working of said road, not exceeding in width one hundred feet on each side of its center line, unless a greater width be required for the purpose of excavation or embankment.

It does not allow them even to contract to get more than one hundred feet on each side unless it is going through a gorge where one hundred feet would not be sufficient for the purpose of excavation or embankment.

And also any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for turnouts, standing places for cars, depots, station-houses, or any other structures required in the construction and operating of said road; and such corporation shall have the right to cut and remove trees or other material that might, by falling, incumber its road-bed, though standing or being more than one hundred feet therefrom; and in case the owner or claimant of such lands or premises and such corporation cannot agree as to the damages, the amount shall be determined by the appraisal of three disinterested commissioners, who shall be appointed upon application by any party to the territorial district court, or the judge thereof, in the district in which the lands or premises to be taken lie; and said commissioners, &c.

It goes on to provide for assessing these damages and for payment previous to taking the land. They only have the right of way, and they take the land for this purpose, and are to pay for it before taking it. If anything else can be taken than is described here, if any limitation should be put on the land they shall take, if there is anything in this enumeration that is not necessary for the construction of the road, then let the bill be amended in that respect, and I will agree to the amendment. I simply want them to have the right to condemn enough land to build the road and to pay for it before they take it, and then that they shall have the absolute title to it; that is, the absolute title to the right to do so.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not think the Senator from Nevada has answered the objections that I have pointed out to this bill. There can be no doubt that the railroad company and the owner of the land have a right, by convention or agreement between them, to settle the value or what shall be paid for the one hundred feet in width; nor is there any trouble or difficulty about the proposition that they can also agree as to what shall be paid for "any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for turnouts, standing places for cars, depots, station-houses, or any other structures required in the construction and operating of said road."

With reference to all these matters, if they cannot agree, then this bill provides that there can be a condemnation for all such purposes, not alone for the one hundred feet in width, but for all the purposes they might agree upon and enter into a contract about. When that condemnation is made and the money paid, the title vests in the railroad company. There is not any question about that. The Senator from Nevada does not pretend to insist that his bill is otherwise. What I want to know is, whether the Senate is willing to pass a bill that shall give to railroad companies in the Territories the power not alone to condemn, in virtue of the right of eminent domain, one hundred feet in width, but also lands for all the purposes that are contemplated in this bill, and about which the parties might contract, and vest the title at once in the railroad company upon the payment of the money, whether they build a mile of the road or not.

Mr. HAGER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion at this point?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAGER. I should like to call the Senator's attention in this connection to section 12. It not merely gives an easement, but it gives absolute title, and with the power to change the route of the road at any time the company see fit. Section 12 says that under certain circumstances they may change the line of their road:

And for the purpose of making such change as aforesaid said corporation shall have all the rights, powers, and privileges granted by sections 8 and 9 of this act.

So that they may locate their line of road through different sections of country, and thus acquire title to each line, and although they abandon the road the title does not revert. They acquire title to the old road and the title to the new road. I think it ought to be limited to merely an easement, instead of acquiring absolute title. That was the ancient rule in regard to all corporations, turnpikes, &c., and it would be much better in a case of this kind, especially as it relates to the Territories.

Mr. STEWART. There is a limitation in section 12 as to that right to change the location of the road.

Mr. WRIGHT. I had intended to refer to section 12.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator from Iowa thinks there is any danger of too much land being condemned or more than is necessary, that can be obviated by confining the power of condemnation to the right of way exclusively; and I will suggest an amendment to him to see if it will meet his view. I am not particular about it. Instead of saying "and in case the owner or claimant of such lands or premises and such corporation cannot agree as to damages" suppose you make it read: "and in case the owner or claimant of the right of way for one hundred feet in width and such corporation cannot agree," &c.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was suggesting to the chairman of the committee some objections to this bill that occurred to me; and my object was simply to point them out to him. I am satisfied if the objections I suggest are well taken that we cannot perfect the bill at this time, and I thought he might wish to have the objections pointed out and then take time for the perfection of the bill. If the objections that I have pointed out do not obtain, then I shall regret to have made them; but it seems to me they do obtain.

I was about to say that section 12, which has been referred to by the Senator from California, had occurred to me also as an additional argument in favor of the proposition that I have stated. The leading principle that I think there is in this bill, and to which the objection obtains, is that it vests the title to the land in the company upon the payment of the money; whereas I understand in all of the States, almost without exception, there is a mere easement in the lands vested and not the title, and that when the road is abandoned, or if the company fail to build it, the title reverts to the owner. I am unwilling to pass a law here that gives the right to organize a corporation in any of the Territories of the United States, and to have as many corporations as can be organized under this general law, and allow them to go to work and survey lines of railroad from one portion of a Territory to another, and as many as they see proper, and then condemn lands and pay the money for them, abandon their road, and thus after a man has line after line run through his farm and he gets his money the railroad is abandoned, the title is gone from him, and he has no power to get it back except at the mere will of the railway company. I do not think that was contemplated by the framers of this bill, and I do not think it is right.

If you pass this bill as it stands the consequence will be this: Any company can organize and lay out their line of road and condemn forty acres of land for every ten miles for depot purposes, if so much be necessary; and then they can get town sites at any and every place they think desirable, have the land condemned, pay the money, abandon the road, and have towns everywhere. They have got the title, not for purposes of the railway merely, but for any and every purpose.

Now, I desire to call attention to the fact that while this is a bill apparently to provide for the organization of railroad companies in the Territories, the last section of the bill provides for something that is in no way connected with territorial organizations. I will read it:

SEC. 21. That the right of way through the unoccupied lands of the United States in any State is hereby granted to any railroad corporation incorporated under the laws of such State to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the center of such railroad; and the right and authority are hereby given to such corporation to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material of earth, stone, timber, and water for the construction and maintenance thereof; and ground for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations is hereby granted to such of said corporations as have not received aid in lands or bonds from the United States, not to exceed forty acres for each ten miles of road hereafter to be constructed, subject to the restrictions of section 19 of this act.

We do not want in a bill of this kind to make a provision that all the corporations organized for railroad purposes in the States shall have the right to go over the public lands of the United States that may be therein, and take one hundred feet, and not only one hundred feet but lands for depot and station-house purposes as contemplated here. I do not see any necessity for it in this bill.

These are some of the objections that occurred to me in looking at the bill as it was read, and others have also occurred to me that I will not take time to point out now; but I suggest to the chairman of the committee whether it would not be better that the bill should go over and he consider these and other matters that may be suggested.

Mr. STEWART. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Iowa that his first objection, and each one of his objections, is not well taken. His first objection is that this is not the right of condemnation, but he says the company acquire title. That is the great objection. If they do not build the road, if they do not grade at least ten miles every year and complete the line in ten years from the time of their organization, if they do not put up 10 per cent. in cash and go on in good faith, they forfeit all their rights.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator tell me where that part of the bill is?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; that is section 11. But not only that, the title that the Senator speaks of is only "for the purposes aforesaid;" that is, the right of way for a railroad. If they do not build the railroad, they forfeit the whole thing by section 11. There cannot be any harm in that. Section 11 provides:

That every railroad corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be required to commence operations on the line of its road within one year from the filing of its certificate with the Secretary of the Interior, and thereafter to grade at least ten miles each year, and to complete the whole line of its road within ten years from the date of the filing of said certificate; and if it shall fail to comply with any of the requirements of this section, it shall forfeit its charter and all the rights and privileges conferred by this act as to any uncompleted portion of its line of road.

And they only acquire title "for the purposes aforesaid;" and notwithstanding they had paid the money, I submit, as a lawyer, that they would not have title to the property unless they built the road.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will my friend from Nevada answer me whether they get title to this land under the act or in virtue of the condemnation?

Mr. STEWART. In virtue of the condemnation for the purposes of this act; that is, for the purposes of the railroad. If they do not build a railroad and do not use it for that purpose, they do not have it at all. The title is for this purpose.

Mr. HOWE. If my friend will indulge me, some of the difficulties which have been suggested by the Senator from Iowa occurred to my own mind before. I ought to have considered this bill with the Senator from Nevada in committee, for I am on his committee; and I tried to do so, and at his instigation I did look at it outside of the committee, and meant to have submitted to him some suggestions before it was reported; but it so happens that the committee of which I have charge meets ordinarily on the same day that this committee does; so I lost that opportunity.

Reading first the eighth section it occurred to me that whatever franchises are granted by the bill are granted to any five men who may associate together and merely say what they want to do, without having any sort of ability to do it, without paying a dollar——

Mr. STEWART. O, no; that is not the section. They have got to put up 10 per cent. before they can proceed to do anything.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator would see whether that is so or not. I think the five men can get the franchise, and when they want to do what they propose to do they do it by selling stock, opening books of subscription to the capital stock.

Mr. STEWART. They have got to subscribe themselves before they can do anything.

Mr. HOWE. How does that appear?

Mr. STEWART. By the language of the bill if you will read it. Section 7 provides:

That the persons named in said certificate of incorporation, or a majority of them, shall be authorized to order books to be opened for receiving subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation, at such time or times, and at such place or places, as they may deem expedient, after having given at least thirty days' notice in a newspaper of general circulation in each Territory through or within which such road will pass, of the time and place of opening books; and as soon as 10 per cent. on the capital stock shall be subscribed and paid, they may give like notice for the stockholders to meet at such time and place as they may designate, for the purpose of choosing five or more directors, who shall continue in office until the time fixed for the annual election, which time shall be within six months from the date when such directors were chosen, and until their successors are chosen and qualified.

Mr. HOWE. Now will the Senator read the first section?

Mr. STEWART. The first section reads thus:

That any number of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory, with all the rights, privileges, and powers conferred by, and subject to all the restrictions of, this act.

Mr. HOWE. Precisely. The five persons become the body-corporate and secure all the franchises granted by the act, whatever they are.

Mr. STEWART. That is the preliminary step until the corporation is organized.

Mr. HOWE. That is the step which creates the body-corporate, the artificial person, the grantee under the act. Now, the section which the Senator read seemed to me to provide only the way in which this body-corporate may get money, to wit, they may, if they see fit, open books of subscription. They may not; they may pay in all the money themselves if they choose. They may open books of subscription. If they do open books of subscription and get the capital stock subscribed and 10 per cent. paid in, then these stockholders may elect directors who will supersede the five persons undoubtedly; but if they do not open such subscriptions the five persons will not be superseded in authority. That was my idea about it.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose they take all the stock and put up their own money.

Mr. HOWE. Suppose they do; then they will not only be the directors of the company, but they will own the stock; they will own it all, and they should, undoubtedly. I am calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that all the franchises are granted in the first section; not under the section which the Senator has read. The franchises are described in the eighth section. What are they? The right to build a road between any points named by themselves; in addition to that, the right of way over the public domain not exceeding a certain width. Another one is the right to depot grounds not exceeding forty acres for every ten miles. These are absolute rights vested in this company, the five persons, if they are never superseded. The eleventh section prescribes that they are to commence work within a year, to grade ten miles every year, and finish the road in ten years; and if they do not do each one of these things they shall forfeit something. What?

Mr. STEWART. Forfeit the road they have not built.

Mr. HOWE. Forfeit the right to complete so much of the road as they have not completed already.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I will ask whether in Wisconsin corporations are created by special act of the Legislature or under a general incorporation law?

Mr. HOWE. Under a general law.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator will find by reference to the general law—I know it is certainly so under the statutes of California and some other States—that the corporation is formed by a few individuals who are authorized to organize a company, and in all such cases, the case of railroad corporations and manufacturing corporations, they open the books and exercise a certain supervisory power. They are rather directors to see that the thing starts right, and then the real subscribers, the stockholders, subsequently come in and elect their own directors and afterward manage the whole affair. The power of a corporation is in them, and not in the first individuals who may organize it.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot undertake to say from recollection what the general law of my own State is in reference to that. If it is as the Senator from California suspects it to be, of course I should make the same criticism in reference to it.

Mr. SARGENT. I asked for information on that point. That is the statute of California; and I know that the statute of Nevada is the same as that of California; and I think the State of Oregon has a similar provision to that of California. I have sent for our statutes to show that they are of the same nature.

Mr. HOWE. It will not relieve my mind of the difficulty I now labor under.

Mr. STEWART. I think I can relieve it if the Senator will allow me. The first section provides—

That any number of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory, with all the rights, privileges, and powers conferred by, and subject to all the restrictions of, this act.

Five persons may become a body-corporate for this purpose. How? That is provided by section 7:

That the persons named in said certificate of incorporation, or a majority of them, shall be authorized—

To do what? Not to build a road, but—to order books to be opened for receiving subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation, at such time or times and at such place or places as they may deem expedient, after having given at least thirty days' notice in a newspaper of general circulation in each Territory through or within which such road will pass of the time and place of opening books.

That is all this act authorizes those five persons to do.

And as soon as 10 per cent. on the capital stock shall be subscribed and paid, they may give like notice for the stockholders to meet at such time and place as they may designate for the purpose of choosing five or more directors—

The only authority given by the act to this corporation is through directors—who shall continue in office until the time fixed for the annual election, which time shall be within six months from the date when such directors were chosen and until their successors are chosen and qualified. At the time and place appointed, directors shall be chosen by ballot by such of the stockholders as shall attend for that purpose either in person or by lawful proxies in writing; each share shall entitle the owner to one vote, and a majority of votes cast shall be necessary for a choice; but, after the first election of directors, no person shall vote on any share on which any installment is in default by reason of the non-payment thereof, after the expiration of the thirty days' notice of sale hereinbefore provided for.

Mr. HOWE. Let me restate to the Senator my difficulty. I refer to the section which points out the way in which the corporation which I think is created by the first section may proceed to get money if it wants to. That is one of the things which it is compelled to do. In addition to the existence of the corporations——

Mr. STEWART. How is it going to get directors?

Mr. HOWE. It may get directors if it please through that section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WEST in the chair.) The Chair will suggest to Senators that perhaps the business of the Senate would be expedited by having them address the Chair.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to suggest that. I am very anxious to hear what the Senator from Wisconsin says. I know it is interesting to the Senator from Nevada; but those who sit around me would like to hear it also.

Mr. HOWE. I beg the Chair to consider itself addressed. I wanted to make myself especially understood by the Senator from Nevada, because he has charge of the bill, and I am so constituted that I cannot talk to the whole Senate at once.

The company may get directors undoubtedly in the way provided by the section which the Senator has read. If it does not choose to get directors in that way, it has directors under the first section of the bill. I may be wrong, but my idea was—and it is that idea to which I wish to call the Senator's attention—that the first section created a full-blooded corporation, not much blood to be sure, but a full-blown corporation.

Mr. STEWART. Now if the Senator will look at the third section he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. SCOTT. Having devoted some attention to this bill in the Committee on Railroads, I will try to meet, if I can, the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin, for I think I apprehend it. His objection is that the first section of the bill creates at once a corporation out of the five persons who may file this certificate, and that if they see proper to go no further, those five persons constitute and continue to be the corporation. I understand he carries his objection one step further, and says that by filing their certificate and designating the route of the road they acquire a franchise at once to build the road upon that route without having paid any money, and that thus they have acquired, as it were, a pre-emption or a lien upon that designated route without having given any assurance that the road will be completed upon it. These, I understand, are the objections which strike him.

Mr. HOWE. Yes; those are my ideas.

Mr. SCOTT. Now let me call his attention to two points fixed in this bill. The first is the filing of the certificate as embraced in the first section; the second is the point fixed in section 11, which I will read:

SEC. 11. That every railroad corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be required to commence operations on the line of its road within one year from the filing of its certificate with the Secretary of the Interior, and thereafter to grade at least ten miles each year, and to complete the whole line of its road within ten years from the date of the filing of said certificate; and if it shall fail to comply with any of the requirements of this section it shall forfeit its charter and all the rights and privileges conferred by this act as to any uncompleted portion of its line of road.

We have those two periods of time designated, first the filing of the certificate, and second one year from the time of filing that certificate, within which now let us inquire what is to be done. If it were a special act of incorporation, the usual proceeding would be to authorize commissioners who within three months would open books and receive subscriptions, and the stockholders must within designated periods after that, thirty or sixty days, pay the installments of those subscriptions as they might be demanded by the commissioners. Unless they do these things and procure the stock for the purpose of building the road, then under this eleventh section at the end of a year their rights will be forfeited. Now look at the seventh section.

SEC. 7. That the persons named in said certificate of incorporation, or a majority of them, shall be authorized to order books to be opened for receiving subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation, at such time or times, and at such place or places, as they may deem expedient, after having given at least thirty days' notice in a newspaper of general circulation in each Territory through or within which such road will pass of the time and place of opening books, &c.

Here is the same machinery provided for the purpose of procuring stock to this road as is usually provided either in a special act of incorporation or in any general act which I have ever seen in any of the States for the purpose of enabling parties associated together to form corporations. Now, I ask, is it an unreasonable provision that these five corporators shall have the same length of time within which, either by their own money if they see proper to go on and do so, they may take all this stock and begin operations, or by giving the notice required by the seventh section bring in other capitalists with them to subscribe their stock and enable them thus to commence their operations within the year?

Mr. HOWE. Now will my friend allow me to point out the distinction between the two cases as it occurs to me?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Under the general law which the Senator says is common in the States, and I guess he is right, the statute says to half a dozen or a dozen individuals "You may be our agents to organize a company which shall have certain franchises; therefore you may dispose of stock, and when a certain amount of stock is secured and a certain amount of it is paid up, those men who have put up that money shall be the corporation and shall be entitled to the franchises." This act, as I understand it, dispenses with all that, and says that five men may get together and say they want to build a road from Dan to Beersheba. and file a certificate of that in the Interior Department, and having said that, signed it with their names, then they have the right to build a road between those two well-known localities, and they have the right of way over all the public lands between those two localities, and have forty acres of land for depot grounds for every ten miles between the two points. Those five men hold these franchises until they are forfeited. When are they forfeited? As I understand it under the eleventh section, so far as there is any forfeiture, not until a year has expired, and not then if they commence operations, strike a spade in the ground. If they do, if they commence operations, whatever is a commencement of operations, then they cannot forfeit anything unless they fail to complete ten miles in the next year; and they must complete the road within ten years. But suppose there is a forfeiture at all, as I conceive under the eleventh section they forfeit the right to complete the uncompleted portion of the road and all the rest of the franchises, which is the right to complete the road and the right of way over the public domain. As it seems to me, the title to the forty acres of land is saved to them absolutely. I may be wrong. The Senator can tell me if I am.

Mr. SCOTT. "It shall forfeit its charter and all the rights and privileges conferred by this act as to any uncompleted portion of its line of road." That is, as I understand it, it would forfeit the right to build the rest of the road and forfeit the forty acres designated upon every section of that road uncompleted. It would retain—I take it for granted that is the intention of the act—the right of way to that portion of the road which was completed and so much of the public lands as should have been designated and occupied upon that portion of it in pursuance of the act.

Mr. HOWE. The forty acres?

Mr. SCOTT. It ought to retain them. As the Senator from Wisconsin and myself have a common interest in securing the object of this bill, I suggest whether the only objection he makes does not grow out of the nature of the country to which this legislation is intended to be applicable. I can see that if this were intended to facilitate the construction of railroads through a thickly populated portion of the country, there might be serious objection to permitting parties to designate a very long line of road and set apart forty acres of land if the Government had land in such sections of the country; but the purpose is here to encourage the investment of actual capital in those portions of the country that are without very much population and where the Government has large bodies of unoccupied and unappropriated lands; and therefore, if the objection of the Senator has very much force in it, it seems to me that it lies in just this one point, namely, that instead of permitting it to be optional with these five persons who may have filed their articles of association to retain the whole stock and build the road so as to exclude all other parties from participating in the enterprise, it should be made obligatory upon them within a certain period to open books of subscription and they should be prohibited from subscribing more than a certain proportion of that stock. If it be deemed advisable that that feature should be incorporated in the bill, I for one should not feel that it was objectionable; and if that were incorporated, it would do away with every other objection than the one which I have stated, namely, that the Senator thinks it is impolitic to permit these five persons to acquire a right to continue for one year over such a long line as they might designate under this bill. That objection, it strikes me, is inseparable from the nature of the country in which it is proposed this bill shall operate, and has not the same pertinency and force in that country that it would have in an older settled and more populous country. I may perhaps not meet the whole view the Senator has, but it strikes me that the objection which he has made is answered to some extent by the suggestions which I have made.

There could hardly be any act of incorporation, even a special act of incorporation, there could hardly be any corporation organized under the general laws of a State which would not require several months for the purpose of organizing—notice to the public, notice by the commissioners of the organization, notice for the purpose of the election of directors; and I do not think that one year is an unreasonable time for permitting the persons who may file this certificate to complete the organization and take measures for securing the capital to construct the road.

Mr. STEWART. There is a provision to which I would call the notice of the Senator from Wisconsin, the fifth section—

That the capital stock of such corporation shall consist of such sum as may be named in the certificate; and the shares of stock shall be regarded as personal property, and shall be subject to execution at law. An installment of 10 per cent. on each share shall be paid in money at the time of making the subscription, and the residue thereof shall be paid in such installments, not exceeding 10 per cent. on each share of stock, as the directors may prescribe; which installments shall not be called for more frequently than once in three months, and shall be payable, at the principal office of the corporation, to such person or persons as may be designated by the directors.

No one can come in, the original parties or others, without paying in advance 10 per cent. The first section says they may be a body-corporate. The next section provides how they shall perfect the corporation by filing articles; and then it is provided that each year they have to do a certain amount of work; and before they can elect directors they have got to take stock and pay for it. Nobody is allowed to be a stockholder without first paying 10 per cent. on the stock. The foundation for it is the Ohio law. It is much more restrictive than that. It has more restrictions than there are in any general law on the statute-books of any State.

Mr. WRIGHT. It seems to me very evident that we cannot perfect this bill at this time. I suggest to the chairman that the bill be either recommitted or passed over.

Mr. STEWART. I think that after the bill has been here two sessions and been referred four times, and been brought back, and Senators have been invited to consider it, it having been on the desks of Senators, they ought to be prepared with their amendments now. This bill is certainly better than the crude legislation the Territories now have. It is better than to allow a Territory like Colorado to have counties in debt three or four times their whole value. It is better than to have one hundred special bills here and to be passing them through, not half so well guarded as this. It is better not to have the Territories involved in special legislation and special privileges until legitimate enterprise is entirely paralyzed. I know plenty of men who have been here year after year to get the right to build a road to a mine. I have one in mind in Utah, where they built the road with their own money, and they had to keep agents here for two sessions before they could get the right of way because of men opposed to it who wanted to levy blackmail on them; and I do not know that they have got it through yet. It was reported at this session. It is better that we should have general legislation, and I submit that Senators ought to be ready with their amendments after this length of time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggested in the interest of the bill that it be recommitted or passed over. Now, if the Senator from Nevada proposes to go on before the Senate with this bill as it is and take his chances, let him do so. If the Senator wants to pass this bill in its present form, I have suggested to him objections that have not been answered, and I am certain that the Senate so feels now. If he wants to put this bill to the Senate now and try to pass it, let him do so.

Mr. STEWART. I most certainly do. I have no more interest in the bill than the Senator from Iowa. If the Senator wants to take the responsibility of defeating general legislation and leaving the Territories involved in their present difficulties, he assumes it the same as I do. I have no more responsibility in the matter than any other Senator, and care no more about the bill than any other Senator. I believe it is in the interest of good government that they should have a decent incorporation law in the Territories under which railroads may be built, and it is a matter of enough importance to secure the attention of the Senate. I have tried to get the attention of members of the committee to it. I have labored hard to get the bill right. I have had the bill printed repeatedly and put on the desks of Senators. Now, do not recommit it again in view of the utter impossibility of getting special consideration to it again. I want to have it either carried or defeated, and let those who defeat it take the responsibility. I have no responsibility in the matter.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, in addition to the objections which have already been made, it occurs to me that there is another objection which may be made to the provisions of the fourteenth section, which is more weighty than any that has hitherto been brought to the attention of the Senate. The fourteenth section is:

That such corporation may acquire, by purchase or gift, any lands in the vicinity of its road, or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way, or such as may be donated, to aid in the construction of such road, and convey the same in such manner as the directors may prescribe; and all deeds and conveyances made by such corporation shall be signed by the president, under the seal of the corporation.

Mr. President, I am in favor of legislation for the purpose of this bill; I am in favor of a general railroad law for the Territories; but I think that that law should be very carefully guarded. I take it for granted that although there may be many men in this body who, like myself, are in favor of such a law and in favor of giving a railroad company the right to take and purchase lands which are necessary for the construction, the use, and the operation of its line of road, there is no member of the Senate who desires to create, under the guise and under the cover of a railroad corporation to operate a railroad, a gigantic corporation with power to speculate in lands. It seems to me that this section gives to railroad corporations such powers, and for this reason: it gives the corporation the power and the right to purchase such land as may be convenient to secure the right of way. That land is not to be purchased simply when the route of that road is located so that the courts may decide that when it was purchased it was a matter of convenience to purchase it for the purpose of securing the right of way. The purchase may be made at any time. Therefore, before the road is located, that corporation may consider that it may desire to build a road through any part of several counties, and before it is located, for the purpose of securing the right of way anywhere it may choose to build, it may go and buy up land anywhere between its two termini. It strikes me that that will be the operation of this section, that lands can be purchased in that way; because it may be fairly urged that inasmuch as the corporation has not located its road it is a matter of convenience for it to secure land wherever it may finally decide that the road shall be built; and in that manner this section will allow it to purchase and hold a large extent of land through the territory where it may be supposed the road will go when it is located. Thus this corporation, which is created as a railroad corporation simply, may become a gigantic speculator in lands, having great advantages over the people of the Territory in which it is located in that respect.

Further, Mr. President, it is provided by this bill that, without the consent of the owner of land, his property may be taken by this corporation and damages assessed to him by certain commissioners. It provides further, that before he shall have the right to a trial by jury, the prescriptive right, the inalienable right of American citizens, he shall give bond to pay all the costs upon both sides. I will note vote for any such provision. It may operate with extreme injustice and hardship in many cases. The settlers in the Territories, who go there in a great many instances on account of their poverty, when their lands are taken for this railroad may not be able to procure there among strangers sureties who will guarantee to the railroad company that all the costs of the proceeding, no matter what the railroad chooses to make them, shall be ultimately paid. And for these reasons, as well as for the reasons urged by the other Senators who have spoken, I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no wish on earth to antagonize the bill of the Senator from Nevada. My purpose and object is to have it as perfect as possible, and, if we can, to obviate the objections that have been pointed out to it. I have suggested objections to the bill and others have which I do not think have been answered. Now we, being upon the Calendar, and being anxious to dispose of the business before us, it occurred to me that the Senator would expedite the passage of his bill and probably get it into such a position as that it could pass through without trouble if he would take it back to his committee and consider the objections that have been pointed out. It may be these objections are not well founded, but I am certain that if he will take the bill into the committee and consider some of them he will find that they are well founded, and then he can report the bill, and it having been considered now, and we understanding its general features, perhaps there will then be no difficulty.

Mr. STEWART. I will state to my friend from Iowa that these objections have been considered over and over and over again; and it is impossible to do anything more in committee. This bill was gone through in the last session by the Committee on Public Lands; and Mr. Casserly spent days on its provisions.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have heard enough from the Senator to know that he does not propose that the bill shall go back to the committee, for the reason that these objections have all been considered.

Mr. STEWART. I do not.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then we will proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. That is the way. If Senators are really in earnest about perfecting the bill let them propose amendments. There is no pride of authorship about this bill. The only desire is to get the legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have suggested to the Senator from Nevada several times that this bill coming up at this time these objections have just occurred to me, and I have had no opportunity to perfect amendments. I have suggested the objections, but he insists that the bill shall go on without any time to consider these amendments.

Mr. STEWART. I do not. There is time here now.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is not time to prepare them.

Mr. STEWART. I undertake to say that this measure is of sufficient importance, and the evils to be remedied are sufficiently glaring, to require that the bill should have its day in court after it has been before two committees four times and had all the consideration that can be given to it. I undertake to say that the condition of things in the Territories demands legislation of this kind, and that if it is put back to a committee it will be impossible to get it through at this session.

Mr. WRIGHT. For the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, I move that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. SARGENT. If the objections to the text of the bill stated by the Senator from Iowa are seen clearly by himself, he certainly can offer amendments obviating the difficulties which he objects to; and the Senate can dispose of the bill and the amendments at the same time. I for one am opposed to the recommittal of this bill, because I know that the evils which it is designed to cure have lasted from year to year, and have been aggravated by the crude local legislation of the Territories. I know that they are running in debt; that their municipalities, their counties, and even the Territories themselves, are running in debt on account of crude legislation in this matter, until Congress was compelled to step in and stop all operations, all enterprises in this direction. Consequently there is no law in the Territories now for the organization of any railroad company. No matter how much a Territory may be growing, or how much it may need these facilities, and how much the local capitalists may be willing to put their hands into their pockets and build a road, there is no power for them even to have the ordinary privileges of an incorporation for this purpose.

I have tried to listen to the best of my ability and to appreciate the objections which have been made to the bill. The objections made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] seem to me to be objections which would exist to all the general incorporation laws of all the States of the Union, so far as I have been able to understand them. Every one of them starts with what is equivalent to a board of commissioners or a few directors who have reposed in them the duty and power to organize the corporation, to open books of subscriptions, to let those who desire to put their money into the concern become stockholders therein, which stockholders meet within a certain limited time to assume the power before that time conferred by law on their predecessors, and their predecessors have no right whatever thereafter in the corporation unless they become stockholders by investment of their own means. This is the ordinary manner in which corporations are organized by general law; and the Senator could have taken up the laws of his own State, the laws of Ohio, from which this bill is principally copied, following them more closely than those of other States, and he could have discovered perhaps in every section difficulties in the way that he might say never would work smoothly. But what is the actual experience? We may say of the great State of Ohio that it is carrying on its railroad system and its corporations are organized upon laws similar to the plans which our committee, after so much consideration, have recommended to the Senate.

I know that an astute lawyer like my friend from Wisconsin can build up a fabric of objections upon almost any premises. It is the duty of the profession to be able to do so, and my friend is learned in his profession. It is within the ability of a sharp, acute man to find objections to that which, if he were considering the other side of the question with as much care, he would perhaps say was faultless. I know what human ingenuity may do, and I know what my friend's ingenuity can do; but I say that this bill is modeled on corporation laws which have been tested by experience, and that, furthermore, those laws are very extensively copied in their principles in his own State, in mine, and in several other States of the Union.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] objects to the fourteenth section of the bill. He thinks there here is not the intention, but certainly the opportunity for these corporations to become gigantic land speculators, and he deduces it from the fourteenth section. The first provision of the fourteenth section is:

> That such corporation may acquire, by purchase or gift, any lands in the vicinity of its road, or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way.

That is the end of that provision. A company does not become a great speculator, I trust, by having the power to acquire, by purchase or by gift, a right of way. There certainly is a very limited opportunity for speculation in that. Is that what the Senator objects to?

The other provision is:

> Or such as may be donated to aid in the construction of such road.

Is it supposed that in their enthusiasm upon the organization of a railroad company the people of a Territory are going to rush in and donate all the land adjoining it and all the lands in the Territory in order that the corporation may become a great speculator in lands? Is that the impulse of the human heart? Do men who own real estate part with it so readily? If the only hope of the corporation becoming a real-estate speculator will be upon that which people give them of their lands, the Senator's fears cannot be very well founded; and yet that is all there is in the fourteenth section upon which the Senator says this great and serious objection is founded.

It seems to me these objections, so much in matters of detail, really ought not to arrest this legislation; but if they are good, let Senators who now sit at leisure at their desks with their attention drawn to this matter prepare apt amendments; and certainly if they have the merit which is claimed for them they will be accepted most readily by the friends of the bill. But I say to you, having observed for some years past the difficulties under which the Territories are laboring, the inconsistency of their laws, the imperfectness of the corporations now existing, the fact that we have cut off any power from them even to create decent ones hereafter, in view of the experience of the past, Congress ought to do something in regard to this matter. We have tried it a number of sessions, and the Committee on Public Lands have been attending to it for two or three sessions, and this is the result of their wisdom now supplemented by the labors of the Committee on Railroads. I think they have done well with a difficult subject, and I trust the Senate will dispose of it, because if the bill is referred again to a committee it will come back again and go on the Calendar, and a single objection will carry it over. This bill was only taken up to-day by a vote, after the objection of a single Senator had stopped it. We are approaching the busy portion of the session. We are now comparatively at leisure. The appropriation bills are not here. The House has not yet sent us the revision of the laws, or sent us back the bankrupt bill. We have an interregnum, I may say, in the business of the Senate; we are rid of the finance question; and now is the time, if any, when we may dispose of business like this; and this is of interest enough to occupy five or six hours. I trust, therefore, Senators will present such amendments as they think the bill ought to have, and that we shall proceed to dispose of it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we often run from one extreme in legislation to another, and I think the discussion of to-day gives evidence of that proposition. It has not been long since we were in the habit of granting to all our States in which public lands were situated and to the Territories liberally of the public lands to aid them in the construction of railroads. I have never seen yet the period of time when I have regretted that I gave the votes I have given in aid of those various roads. We thereby opened up a distant and wilderness country and made it productive and valuable, and the Government did not contribute one farthing toward it, because it received from its remaining lands all that it would have received if the roads had not been built. Now the policy is changed, and here to-day we are debating whether we will give the Territories a law that will grant them a simple right of way. That is running into the other extreme pretty hard.

Objections are raised to this bill, and as my friend from California has well said objections raised by technical legal minds, and objections that ought not to control our better judgment here. We have had, I believe, a class of philosophers in the world who denied their own existence and proved it satisfactorily, at least to themselves. You will find legal men who will prove any proposition of that same kind.

Now, sir, I have an objection to this bill, and it is a very strong one with me. It is too restrictive. You ought to have been more liberal in the bill toward these Territories than you have been. I would say, if I could address the committee, though probably they have acted more wisely than I would, that there is a broad difference between an old-settled and cultivated State, where there are wealthy populations to build roads, and a struggling infant Territory. They are as far apart almost as the heavens from the earth. In any Territory the people will struggle and struggle hard for the ability to build roads, not enter into speculation.

The Senator from New Hampshire suggests an objection to the fourteenth section. I do not feel the force of that objection; but if there be force in it, that Senator can prepare an amendment in one minute that will make that section conform to his own judgment. There are a good many matters along on this Calendar that I should like very well to see acted on, and there are many which will be acted upon without discussion in which I feel an interest; but I do feel that this bill, now being before us and having been acquainted with it for the last four years, if we do not act upon it now those who will be here four years to come will be vexed with it. I think we owe it to the Territories to dispose of it now. I certainly have heard no objection yet that the Senators making it cannot prepare an amendment to obviate in two moments. I do not myself regard the objections made as important. They do; very well. Then it is not only their right, but I hold it to be their duty, to offer amendments which would be right in their judgment, whether they meet the judgment of the Senate or not. Following that rule, I believe in a very few hours we can complete this bill so that it will meet the approval of the Senate. I hope, therefore, it will not be recommitted.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope this bill will not be recommitted, because if it is, when it comes back again the probability is that many Senators will again have objections raised in their minds, and there will be as much reason for recommitting it again as there is now. I am very glad that objections have been made, and I shall endeavor, having participated in the framing of the bill, to meet them as they are raised, so that we may, if they are well founded, incorporate other provisions in the bill, and if they are not well founded may answer them.

The Senator from New Hampshire objects to the fourteenth section of the bill, for the reason that he thinks it would authorize these railroad companies to become speculators in lands. I understand that to be the point of his objection. Now let me read that section:

> SEC. 14. That such corporation may acquire by purchase or gift any lands in the vicinity of its road or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way, or such as may be donated to aid in the construction of such road, and convey the same in such manner as the directors may prescribe; and all deeds and conveyances made by such corporation shall be signed by the president under the seal of the corporation.

His objection seems to be that the company may designate, before they have actually located their road, various lines, and may purchase or procure to be donated to them lands upon these lines, and thus become the proprietors of large bodies of land. If the Senator will turn to the second section of the bill he will find that that objection is entirely obviated by the provisions of that section, for it requires, in prescribing what is to be contained in the certificate:

> First, the name of such corporation, by which it shall be known; secondly, the name of the county or counties and Territory or Territories where the termini of said road are to be located, and the county or counties and Territory or Territories through which such road shall pass, and the general route of said road.

It is impossible for a corporation under this section to do what the Senator from New Hampshire feared it might do, lay down lines through two or three counties and select lands upon those lines, because they must not only fix the termini of their road but they must name the very counties through which the road is to pass; and in the twelfth section, to which reference was made for another purpose, even where they change the line of the route with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior they are restricted in that change from going away from the general route of the road. This effectually prevents this corporation from spreading itself all over the country and procuring land; and all that they can procure in any event on any route that they may select, under the fourteenth section, is land "in the vicinity of its road." It can have but one line, and that must be designated. "Or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way, or such as may be donated to aid in the construction of such road."

I take it there can be no objection, if parties were found to be so liberal as to donate their lands and give them away for nothing to aid in the construction of the road in the first instance, that the company should receive them. I know it was not the intention of the committee to invest these corporations with power of dealing in lands generally; and if the Senator thinks the section is so broad as that such power might lurk under it, certainly the committee would only be too glad to obviate his objection; for their purpose has been not to enlarge but to restrict the powers of these corporations, so that there shall be no objectionable powers exercised.

He makes another objection, and that is under the eighth section the owner of land is required to give bond before he can have a jury trial. I have never met, according to my recollection, any provision with reference to railroads, either in States or Territories, in which after an appraisement had been made of damages by a board of viewers or assessors, and either party was dissatified, he was not required to give bonds if he appealed from the decision of the viewers; and this provision is just as much for the protection of the land-owner as it is for the convenience of the corporation, because it will be observed that the provision of the bond is that unless the party appealing procures a more favorable award than that from which he appeals he is to pay the costs. If the Senator's objection is a valid one, it ought to apply to both sides, and he would permit the railroad company to appeal from an award without giving bond, and thus an insolvent railroad corporation might mulct the land-owner in costs and he would have no remedy. This is a provision looking to the interest of both parties, and one to which no reasonable man certainly will object if he looks at all the bearings of it.

Now, as to the objection made by my friend from Iowa as to the appraisement of the value of the lands of non-resident owners. His objection seems to be that the court may appoint some person to represent a non-resident owner; and that the owner is given only six years to come in and ask that such an appraisement shall be opened; that after the lapse of six years his remedy is gone, and all he can get is the damages that have been assessed and paid into court for him. If the Senator thinks that is not sufficient, if the court should be required to give notice by advertisement, let him offer an amendment of that kind. There will be no objection to that. The intention of the committee was, upon the assumption that the courts would act in good faith, to give the non-resident owners a better opportunity of being heard in the court. The usual provision is in the case of a non-resident owner where notice cannot be served upon him that the court shall be authorized to give such notice as they may deem most likely to meet his eye by publication; but here it is required, not that the proceeding shall go on simply by a notice by publication, but that the court shall provide a party, who shall give bond for the faithful execution of his trust, to represent this absent owner. Now, unless it were to be assumed that the court would be in collusion with the railroad company and appoint some man of straw and accept straw-bail for the purpose of representing an absent owner, it seems to me that this is as good a provision as could be made for the protection of the absent owner; but if the Senator from Iowa thinks there ought to be superadded to this provision a notice by publication, let him propose to add it and there will be no objection in the world.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say right here that I shall not vote for the recommittal of this bill to the Committee on Railroads. I do not want to delay the passage of the bill an hour. I do not want to throw an obstacle in the way of the passage of a proper bill. I do not want to throw an obstacle in the way of the passage of this bill if those who have it in charge really think it is the bill that ought to be passed.

The suggestion thrown out by the Senator from California and enforced by the Senator from Maine that I was urging legal and technical objections to this bill is not called for at all. I must confess I do not think it any disgrace to any objection that it is a legal objection; but I am not here in a captious spirit. I am a little surprised that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not see any more merit in the objection I started than he seems to see. I am very certain that when the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself differ upon a question of law I am in error, or else he is. I think those Senators are mistaken in supposing that this bill is quite analogous to the ordinary general railroad incorporation laws of the States, because my impression is that under those laws nothing is vested in any persons except those who have subscribed to a certain amount of stock and paid up a certain amount of money, whereas in this case I think all the franchises are granted to five men who have not paid a dollar and who are not compelled to pay a dollar. They have simply expressed a wish and put that on record; but even that I do not particularly object to. I think it is pretty loose; I think the ordinary laws as I have stated them are rather loose; but I can grant a little more freedom in a Territory than I can in a State.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely sure that under the eleventh section, if the conditions prescribed in the preceding sections are not complied with, everything is taken away from the company which by the first section is granted to the company, I will be content with his assurance upon that point. But my impression very strongly is that the franchises granted by this act are not merely the right to build a road, not merely the right of way for a road, but the fee to forty acres of land on every ten miles of the route prescribed for the road; and that in case of forfeiture only the right to complete the road is forfeited, and the fee of the lands granted still continues to the corporation or its assignees, and that before that forfeiture has operated a mortgage may have been placed upon it by the five men, or the forty acres or any portion of them may have been alienated. That is my impression. If the Senator says I am wrong, I acquiesce. I will not propose an amendment. I am not here to oppose the bill captiously.

I did want to say one word more in the hearing of my honorable friend from Maine, whom I do not see in the Chamber, but I will say it in the hearing of the Senate. He complains that we seem to have drifted from one extreme to another. He points us to a time when we were willing not only to grant to States the right of way for railways, but the right to a certain portion of the lands on the line of the roads. He says he participated in that sort of legislation. He says he does not repent himself of that legislation. Well, I wish I could tell him that I glory in his spunk. I wish I could tell him that I am another just such man. I wish I could tell him that I never failed to vote for such a proposition when I had an opportunity to vote for it. I will tell other Senators about me that I never shall fail to vote for such a proposition when I have an opportunity. I do not care what the temper of the day is; I do not care what the last State convention says here or there; I say that where the United States owns a body of public lands within any State and will not give to the State one-half of those lands within five or ten miles of the line of a road to put a great public iron highway through the land—when Congress will not do that Congress does not know its interests. I say no human being who found himself owner of such a body of lands and who should refuse to give one-half of them to have a road put through them ought to be put under guardianship at once. He is not fit to manage an estate. I do not repent myself of any of this legislation, therefore. This is no such proposition. This does not propose to give anything to a State or to a Territory. It takes from the Territories, as it seems to me, the right to build roads and allows five men to run all over the Territories everywhere and secure the right to build roads in every direction; and not only that, but allows them, as I think, to secure forty acres of public land in every distance of ten miles without building any road at all. If I am mistaken on this point I acquiesce in the bill, loose as I think it is in other particulars; and if the Senator from Pennsylvania is quite sure I am mistaken, I shall acquiesce in his judgment. He has thought of this measure more than I have. I was particularly anxious not to be misunderstood upon this other point, that I am going back on my record in reference to railway grants one inch.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Wisconsin has stated the proposition that where he and I differ on a legal point certainly one of us must be wrong. That may be true; but I wish—as I have so much respect for any opinion he entertains—to see whether I cannot obviate the objection which he has to this section by inserting in the ninth line of the eleventh section, between the words "rights" and "and," the word "property;" so as to read:

It shall forfeit its charter and all the rights, property, and privileges conferred by this act as to any uncompleted portion of its line of road.

So that if it were to construct a portion of its road and leave uncompleted a portion and a forfeiture occurred, then the road-way and the forty acres on the uncompleted portion would be carried with the forfeiture.

Mr. HOWE. That would obviate the difficulty provided the previous sections are so drawn that the company cannot mortgage or alienate the forty acres or any part of it and so take it from under the subject of forfeiture.

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest that that amendment be put in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend the amendment reported by the committee by inserting between the word "rights" and the word "and," in line 9 of the eleventh section, the word "property."

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that being taken by consent, but I have a motion pending to recommit, and during the pendency of that motion it is not in order to amend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa is correct. The amendment is not in order if objection is made.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not object as to matter of form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair then will entertain the amendment. The Chair hears no objection to it, and the amendment is agreed to. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HAGER. I do not rise to favor the motion, but I wish to call the attention of the committee to a section of the bill that I presume is intended to cover a class of cases in regard to which a great many bills are pending now. I introduced a bill myself for the purpose of obtaining the right of way for a railroad from a point in the State of California to a point in the State of Nevada. The twenty-first section, as I understand, is intended to apply to cases of that kind; at least I was informed by one of the members of the committee, to whom I applied for information in regard to the bill I introduced, that they intended to present a general law which would cover the kind of case that my bill was intended to meet, and I presume that this twenty-first section is intended to be that general law to meet those cases; but it is not sufficiently comprehensive to meet the kind of case that I referred to. It reads:

That the right of way through the unoccupied public lands of the United States n any State is hereby granted to any railroad corporation incorporated under the aws of such State.

The true construction to be put upon that is, that a railroad incorporated, say, in the State of California, can only obtain the right of way under this section in that State, and not beyond the borders of the State of California.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask if a railroad corporation in California have the right to construct a road beyond that State by virtue of that incorporation?

Mr. HAGER. The Central Pacific Railroad Company is chartered by the State of California and it runs through Nevada——

Mr. STEWART. But that was by legislation of Congress when Nevada was a Territory. I do not understand that one State has any power to authorize a corporation in another.

Mr. HAGER. A corporation has extra-territorial powers as a general rule——

Mr. STEWART. For certain purposes——

Mr. HAGER. Certainly, for the purpose of operating a railroad.

Mr. STEWART. That is by mere comity.

Mr. HAGER. They may get the right of way, and the corporation may acquire property rights.

Mr. STEWART. But a corporation for the purpose of constructing a railroad is always within the limits of the State granting the charter, and it is confined to the State chartering it. It exercises the right to condemn private property for public use. It exercises part of the sovereignty of a State. A railroad company chartered by California cannot condemn property in Nevada under the laws of California.

Mr. HAGER. I admit that. But I ask the Senator whether he intends to say that a railroad company incorporated in California must be reincorporated in Nevada in order to get through?

Mr. STEWART. You cannot by general law authorize one State to organize corporations and get land in another.

Mr. HAGER. But here is the supreme power granting the right of way, and it grants it to a corporation formed in any State. A corporation formed in the State of California wants a right of way through a Territory adjoining, and no power but Congress can grant it, and that power is not given here. That is the point.

Mr. STEWART. It is in another State.

Mr. HAGER. Let it be another Territory or State.

Mr. STEWART. A State has no right to organize a corporation to build a railroad in a Territory, and it has no right to organize a corporation to build a railroad beyond its State line. Consequently this is a case where the powers of the State do not apply.

Mr. HAGER. I do not agree with the Senator in that respect. A corporation in the State of California has certain rights in another State. It may not have the power to condemn land, but it has certain corporate rights by virtue of its incorporation in the State. It may sue in other States besides the State in which it was incorporated to enforce its rights; but when it comes to acquiring territorial rights by way of property, which affect the domain, the sovereign power, then of course it must apply to that sovereign power for that authority.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to my friend that if he is going to build a railroad through two States he must get the consent of both States, and then this section will apply. A corporation cannot build beyond its own State under that State's authority. Of course, the comity of States will allow a corporation in one State to do business in another.

Mr. HAGER. I wish to bring the Senator's attention to the precise case that I stated. I introduced a bill in order that a corporation incorporated under the laws of California might obtain the right of way from a point in the State of California to a point in the State of Nevada. That is the very object I had in view in introducing that bill. I applied to the Senator in regard to it, and he said the committee intended to introduce a general law which would cover that particular case; and as I understand this is the general law that is intended to cover that case, which I say it does not.

Mr. STEWART. I understood the Senator's road to be all in the State of California.

Mr. HAGER. Not at all.

Mr. STEWART. I thought it went to Truckee.

Mr. HAGER. It is intended to connect with the iron mines in the Sierra Nevada, and to run to a point on the Central Pacific Railroad in the State of Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Is that point Reno?

Mr. HAGER. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. Then that is a special case and will require special legislation, but this bill will not interfere with it at all. I apprehend, however, that in order to build that road you will have to get a charter from the State of Nevada.

Mr. HAGER. I wanted to know whether this was intended to take the place of that kind of legislation. If it is not, then I would respectfully ask the committee to report back that bill, and I hope it will not be delayed by this legislation.

Mr. STEWART. If a case arises where a road extends through more than one State, and it should turn out that the State organizing the charter has power to go beyond its own State line, so that the corporation could exist beyond that, that would be a case for special legislation. I presume before you build in that other State you must have legislation in that State, and having previous legislation in the other State, then it would be a corporation of both States, and this section would cover it.

Mr. HAGER. If this section is not intended to cover that kind of case, I have nothing more to say; but I supposed it was intended to cover that particular case, and I wished to call the attention of the committee to show that it was not sufficient to meet the difficulty.

Mr. STEWART. I apprehend it will cover it when there is power given by both States, because the right of a corporation to act in two States must emanate from both States. Suppose you build the road referred to over the line of Nevada to Reno, and you want to condemn private property, you cannot do that under the California charter; you must have a charter from Nevada. Then it will be a corporation of Nevada, and this section will apply.

Mr. HAGER. I understand that lands cannot be condemned in one State under a charter from another; but suppose all the territory through which it passes is public land of the United States. Then it would not be necessary to reincorporate the company in Nevada in order to condemn lands, but the United States could grant the right of way over them, and then the company would have the entire roadway through to the point, the terminus they wish to reach. It would not be necessary in that case to apply to the State of Nevada in order to get the right of way; they would have it already from the United States.

Mr. CAMERON. We can scarcely get through with this bill to-day. Therefore I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) Several days ago I introduced a bill providing for a new election in the State of Louisiana. It is important to all parties that that matter should be disposed of. I have consulted with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] who desires to speak upon the bill. Next Monday will be agreeable to him, and I therefore desire to give notice that on Monday next, after the expiration of the morning hour, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill. I hope that the Senate will pass upon the bill without a reference to a committee I do not see any necessity for its going there, and I shall hope that the Senate will dispose of the bill as soon as possible.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senate will lay it on the table when it is called up.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well; that will be for the Senate to say.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON'S motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE AT PINE BLUFF, ARKANSAS.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2541) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Arkansas, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RANDALL. Let that bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the consent of the United States is hereby given to Henry B. Morse, Met L. Jones, James F. Vaughn, Richard A. Dawson, William H. Bush, James M. Holcombe, Gabriel Meyer, George W. Prigmore, John L. Buck, Ira McL. Barton, John M. Clayton, William N. Portis, Benjamin Twombly, Hugh H. Kenyon, and Richard H. Stanford, and their associates, first having obtained an act of incorporation by the State of Arkansas, to build a railroad-transit and wagon-bridge across the Arkansas River, at or near Pine Bluff, in Arkansas; and that the company or corporation herein authorized to construct said bridge shall give notice for one week in two newspapers having a wide circulation in cities situated on the river near the locality of the proposed bridge, and shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination, a design and drawings of the bridge and piers, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of at least one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction of the current at all stages, and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject by the Secretary of War; and if the Secretary of War is satisfied that the provisions of the law have been complied with in regard to location, the building of the piers may be at once commenced; but if it shall appear that the conditions prescribed by this act cannot be complied with at the location where it is desired to construct the bridge, the Secretary of War shall, after considering any remonstrances filed against the building of said bridge, and furnishing copies of such remonstrances to the board of engineers provided for in this act, detail a board composed of three experienced officers of the Corps of Engineers, to examine the case, and may, on their recommendation, authorize such modifications in the requirements of this act, as to location and piers, as will permit the construction of the bridge; not, however, diminishing the width of the spans contemplated by this act.

SEC. 2. That any bridge under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company or association building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of a draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with continuous and unbroken spans, it shall not be, in any case, of less elevation than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge; nor shall the spans be of less than two hundred and fifty feet in the clear; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river at that stage of the river which is most important for navigation; and that no ripraps or other outside protection for imperfect foundation will be permitted in the channel-way of the high span, or of the draw openings; and that the main span shall be over the main channel at low water: And provided also, That if the said bridge be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall have a pivot draw, giving two clear openings of one hundred and sixty feet each, measured at right angles to the current at the average stage of water in the river, and located in a part of the bridge that can be safely and conveniently reached at that stage; and that said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the stationary spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draw before or after the passage of trains; and the next adjoining span to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet, and said span shall not be less than thirty feet above low-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river.

SEC. 3. That the said bridge, according to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over same of the mails, the troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate paid per mile for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge.

SEC. 4. That all railway companies desiring to use said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 5. That the United States shall have the right of way for postal-telegraph purposes across said bridge.

SEC. 6. That all parties owning, occupying, or operating said bridge shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise throughout the year, such lights on said bridge as may be required by the Light-House Board for the security of navigation; and all persons owning, occupying, or operating said bridge shall, in any event, maintain all lights on said bridge that may be necessary for the security of navigation.

SEC. 7. That said corporation or association may execute a mortgage and issue bonds, payable principal and interest in gold or United States currency, and may at any time transfer their charter under the provisions of this act of association or incorporation.

SEC. 8. That the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the future construction of bridges is hereby expressly reserved, without any liability of the Government for damages on account of the alteration or amendment of this act, or on account of the prevention or requiring the removal of any such obstructions; and if any change be made in the plan of construction of any bridge constructed under this act, during the progress of the work thereon or before the completion of such bridge, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any change in the construction or any alteration of any such bridge that may be directed at any time by Congress shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners thereof.

Mr. SPEER. As I understand the first section, it provides for publication of notice of one week only. Should not that be one month?

Mr. NEGLEY. It requires notice to be published in two papers.

Mr. SPEER. But for only one week. Should not that be one month?

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPECIFIC DUTIES ON TIN PLATES.

Mr. SWANN, by unanimous consent, presented memorials numerously signed by merchants, importers, dealers, and workers of tin plates in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore and other cities of Maryland, praying for the conversion of the present ad valorem duty on importation of tin plates into a corresponding and equivalent duty; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable Finance Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists—merchants, importers, dealers, and workers of tin plates—respectfully request that you will consider the expediency and recommend to Congress the conversion of its present ad valorem duty on the import of tin plates into a corresponding and equivalent specific duty, as a measure calculated to simplify and increase the collection of the customs revenue, facilitate the transaction of business, give stability to prices, and at once and forever render disagreements between the importer and the Government a practical impossibility.

Tin plate was taxed for the first time in our tariff history in 1842, at the rate of 2½ per cent. ad valorem. In 1846 the duty was increased to 15 per cent., which in 1857 was reduced to 8 per cent. In 1862 the duty was raised to 25 per cent., and in 1872 it was reduced to 15 per cent., which is the present law.

As a raw material, constituting the basis of great branches of domestic industry; as an important element in the cost of a large class of articles, especially used by the very poorest of the people, as well as for its use in building, for machinery, and for the preparation of products largely exported, or which require domestic transportation in air-tight metal packages as a condition of sale and consumption, tin plate has a strong claim to be exempted from all direct taxation. Thus millions of dollars' worth of fruit, green corn and other vegetables, as well as oysters and other shellfish, are annually put up in tin cans for exportation or for domestic markets. Refined petroleum, also, is shipped to all parts of the world almost exclusively in tin cans, while the census of 1870 returns 30,524 persons whose occupation is that of working upon tin.

In the present financial condition of the country your memorialists, however, prefer no claim for any reduction or exemption of taxation in respect to this article; but they do claim, that so long as it is considered expedient to impose a duty upon its importation, the substitution of an equivalent specific for the existing ad valorem duty would be in the highest degree beneficial to both the Government and the merchants. That such a specific duty can, moreover, be easily substituted without loss to the Treasury, will be made evident from an examination of the following tables:

The importations of tin plates during the last two fiscal years were in value as follows:

1872—Amount in value imported	$12,312,428
Total value	27,306,078

That with an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. the accruing revenue would have amounted on this importation to $4,095,761.70.

But the actual weight imported during the above two years was:

	Pounds.
1872—Gross weight, including boxes	209,671,640
1873—Gross weight, including boxes	214,069,374
Total pounds	423,741,014

Which import, at a specific duty of one cent per pound gross weight, (or including the weight of the packages,) would have yielded a revenue of $4,237,410.14. The difference in two years' revenue receipts, therefore, between the present ad valorem and the recommended specific rate of duty would have been only $141,648.44, or about $70,000 per annum, and that $70,000 in favor of the revenue.

The assessment of a specific duty of one cent per pound on tin plates, including boxes, would do away forever with any uncertainty in respect to valuations, and the conflicting appraisements of market value and cost price; for it should be understood that tin plates are not kept in stock in England in large quantities, but have to be contracted for months ahead. Hence, it invariably happens that the actual cost of this article conflicts with the market value at the time of shipment. Thus, for example, A, who lives in New York or Boston, and contracts in Wales in January for tin plates, to be delivered in March at thirty shillings per box, is obliged to invoice them at thirty shillings, although the price in Liverpool in March has actually fallen to twenty-five shillings per box. If, on the other hand, the price in March in Liverpool is thirty-five shillings, A is by law bound to add five shillings to the actual cost, in order to make it market value at the time of shipment in Liverpool. B, on the other hand, living in England, and contracting in January for tin plates at thirty shillings per box, to be delivered in March, if he sends his tin plates on consignment to New York, can invoice them at twenty-five shillings, if that is the then market value in Liverpool, and pay only duty on twenty-five shillings. The present law, therefore, discriminates against the American importer and in favor of the foreign commission merchant.

Your memorialists would also recommend a provision of law in connection with the proposed substitution of duty, to the effect that all tin plates imported into the United States shall have the gross weight branded on the box. This would be an additional safeguard, and facilitate and expedite the passing of this very important product of our importation through the custom-house.

J. EARL AND T. W. DEXTER.

On motion of Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3296) for the relief of J. Earl and T. W. Dexter; and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUBLICATION OF LAWS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1730) relative to the publication of laws in the District of Columbia; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION OF NEW INVENTIONS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty-six minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2512) to promote new and useful inventions in the United States, which was reported back adversely from the Committee on Patents.

The bill was laid upon the table, and the adverse report ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Patents, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 872) for the encouragement and relief of inventors and patentees; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WARD'S IMPROVED BULLET-MACHINE.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Patents, reported as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 1605 a bill (H. R. No. 2880) for the extension of the patent known as Ward's improved bullet-machine; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent granted to him on the 10th day of November, 1857, for an improved bullet-machine for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years for which said letters-patent are granted; such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the aforesaid original term of said patent. And upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner, upon giving the same notice, and with the same effect, as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law, and as if the original term of said patent had not expired; provided no person shall be held liable for the infringement of said patent, if extended, for making use of said invention since the expiration of the original term of said patent and prior to the date of its extension.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF WORK ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2653) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend work upon the public buildings.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to defer operations on any public buildings that are authorized by existing laws but not actually commenced, or to proceed with the same, as may in his opinion be for the best interests of the public service; provided that all moneys heretofore appropriated for the construction of public buildings and now remaining to the credit of the same on the books of the Treasury Department, or which may hereafter be appropriated for such buildings, shall remain available until the completion of the work for which they are or may be appropriated; and upon the final completion of each or any of said buildings, and the payment of all outstanding liabilities therefor, the balance or balances remaining shall be immediately covered into the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not see how the point of order can be sustained. The bill makes no provision of money or of property.

Mr. GARFIELD. It makes provision in regard to unexpended balances of appropriations already made, and appropriates them in perpetuity.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. It makes no change in the law except so far as it provides for unexpended balances being covered into the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the members of the House are a little rusty upon the new rule, and will direct it to be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

All bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill has this proviso:

Provided, That all moneys heretofore appropriated for the construction of public buildings and now remaining to the credit of the same on the books of the Treasury Department, or which may hereafter be appropriated for such buildings, shall remain available until the completion of the work for which they are, or may be, appropriated, &c.

The Chair thinks that the bill is very clearly liable to the point of order under the rule which has been read. The bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. KILLINGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, required to investigate the alleged violation of the eight-hour law in the work on the New York post-office, and to send for persons and papers if necessary.

The committee report back this resolution, accompanied by a report in writing and certain testimony, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. COX. I would like to hear the conclusions of the committee.

Mr. KILLINGER. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, required to investigate the alleged violation of the eight-hour law in the work on the New York post-office, and to send for persons and papers if necessary."

Respectfully report:

That they have carefully considered all the statements submitted and testimony produced before them bearing upon the subject-matter of the above resolution. The material question is one of fact, whether the eight-hour law, passed June 25, 1868, which declares that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, has been violated in the work done on the New York post-office building. No time is designated when the alleged violation of the law took place, and we may assume that the complaint embraces all the work done from its commencement to the present time.

It will be observed that the inquiry does not involve the expediency or inexpediency of the law itself, and we do not propose to go beyond the instructions of the House in this regard. It appears that the law was not observed in all cases and at all times prior to May, 1872, so far at least as the work on the New York post-office building was concerned. It required a peremptory order from the Secretary of the Treasury to the superintendent of said building, directing its enforcement in all such work. From that time forward it does not appear that the superintendent of said building, or any one acting under his orders, employed any laborer, workman, or mechanic to do a day's work, otherwise than in accordance with the law referred to, and the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. And it is but just to add that no laborer, workman, or mechanic employed on the building since the date specified has appeared before the committee to substantiate any alleged violation of the law.

The labor unions of New York, however, appeared in the persons of recognized representatives, and complained that the law was being violated by indirection. They allege, and the evidence sustains the allegation, that the Government agent, Mr. Mullett, has employed Marshall J. Davidson, a prominent machinist of New York City, to design and construct the heating and ventilating apparatus to be used in the said building. Under the contract thus assumed by him, Mr. Davidson employs his own workmen, and on his own terms, without consulting the United States authorities, and without a reference to the eight-hour law. Mr. Davidson says in his testimony that the Government reserves the right, and has the option, to pay him the contract price or the actual cost of the materials and labor, increased by a percentage. This reservation would seem to be a sufficient protection to the Government against excessive charges, but the question here is not so much the price to be paid by the Government, as the right of the Government agents to contract for the performance of work on Government buildings in the manner here specified.

It is claimed that such percentage contracts are subversive of the eight-hour law in its true intent and meaning. And, on the other hand, it is asserted that machinery like that referred to cannot be manufactured outside of machine-shops, and by other than scientific men with the aid of skilled labor. In addition to this consideration it appears that the question raised here has been considered by the Attorney-General of the United States, and his opinion is regarded by the Treasury Department, as expressed by Mr. Mullett, as conclusive upon it. In the opinion of the Attorney-General, filed May 2, 1872, in the case of certain stone-cutters employed near Richmond, Virginia, in getting out granite for the building in course of erection for the State Department, the following language occurs:

"The letter of the act of Congress limits its operations to laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, and I am aware of no reason to suppose that the act was intended to have operation beyond the immediate employés of the Government."

In that case, as in the present case, the contractor employed the men, and the Attorney-General was of opinion that he, the contractor, "would have just cause of complaint if the Government should undertake to interfere between him and his employés by prescribing regulations for their labor."

We simply cite this opinion of the Attorney-General, which seems to rule the action of the Treasury Department and its Supervising Architect, and not with a view to discuss its terms. Until reviewed or reversed by higher authority it must be admitted to have force and effect upon those who are bound by it. Its conclusions are understood to be of binding force by the Government agents; and it is manifest that if Congress desires to bring within the eight-hour law such cases of alleged infraction as we have been considering, some means must be found to overcome the difficulty suggested. The friends of that law will have to secure a judicial construction of the law as it now stands in the statute-book or additional legislation. Until one or the other remedy is sought and applied, the Secretary of the Treasury will probably feel himself justified in following the instructions of the highest law-officer of the Government in this regard. The committee offer the following resolution.

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. COX. I desire to say just one word. I introduced the resolution with reference to this investigation. I believed that the eight-hour law ought to be carried out or repealed, and that an investigation ought to be made as to its effect. It has not been carried out either in New York or in other works on public buildings. The report of the committee of course tells the truth, so far as that committee could understand it; but there is jugglery toward workmen on that and on all other public buildings, and I say to this House and to my friend from Pennsylvania that the eight-hour law ought to be repealed or enforced. And now let this House take action on the subject. I have brought it to the attention of the House, and that is all I can do in the presence of this adverse report.

Mr. KILLINGER. I wish to state that the committee do not think it necessary that the testimony submitted with the report should be printed. It is of course in the power of the House to order the printing if they see fit.

Mr. COX. I would like to have it printed.

Mr. KILLINGER. I have no objection, and I think the committee have none.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I think it necessary for me to notice for a moment the statement of the gentleman from New York that the eight-hour law is being habitually violated in the construction of public buildings. I state here that it is not being violated on any public buildings in the United States, and that the gentleman can bring forward no evidence to substantiate the broad statement he has made. I assert on the contrary that the eight-hour law is being enforced on every public work in the United States under the express orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, and there is not now nor has there been any violation of it since 1872.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to, and the report and accompanying testimony ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF ARCHITECTURE.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1682) to provide for a Bureau of Architecture; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT PITTSBURGH.

Mr. SESSIONS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2787) to provide for the sale of the present United States marine hospital and site and the purchase of a new site and erection thereon of a new marine hospital in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of at public sale, to the highest bidder, the United States marine hospital building, and grounds pertaining thereto, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; and to procure by purchase a site in or convenient to the said city of Pittsburgh, which shall be eligibly and healthfully located and shall be ceded to the United States Government by the State of Pennsylvania, and erect thereon a suitable building for use as a United States marine hospital, the same to be of such dimensions as shall be sufficient to accommodate all such mariners as would be likely to seek asylum at that point. The cost of site and construction of the new building are not to exceed the sum realized from the sale of the present building and site, and the new site is not to be purchased or the construction of the building commenced until the sale of the present building and site is concluded. The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized to provide for the care and maintenance in private hospitals of such patients as are entitled to admission to a United States marine hospital during the construction of the new building, provided the terms of sale of the present building will not admit of their remaining therein until the new building is ready for occupancy.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that that bill requires an appropriation of money, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEER. Is that point of order good? The bill provides simply that the money arising from the sale of the present building shall be reinvested in a new one. It provides that the building of a new hospital shall not cost a dollar more than is realized from the sale of the present building.

The SPEAKER. Suppose the gentleman should move to knock out that provision by way of amendment; the Chair could not rule it out.

Mr. SPEER. The House might not knock it out.

The SPEAKER. Still such an amendment would be in order. Non constat that the House might not agree to it. The rule is so very strict that the Chair advises the House that it is very difficult in any way to get an appropriation of money or of public property through except in Committee of the Whole. If the gentleman from Vermont insists on the point of order, the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to the bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEER. Did the gentleman from Vermont hear the proviso to the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I find that the restrictions that you put upon the cost of public buildings are never adhered to.

Mr. SPEER. That is the fault of succeeding Congresses and not of the one that passes the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont does not object to the bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. The bill has been read twice and the question now is upon ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. SESSIONS. It is ascertained that the old marine hospital at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, is entirely inadequate for the accommodation of the inmates of that hospital. This bill provides that the present hospital, which is old and insufficient for the purposes for which it was constructed, shall be sold to the highest bidder at public auction, and that the avails of it shall be invested in new grounds and in the construction of a new hospital, and that no money shall be expended for the purpose of purchasing grounds and the construction of a new building beyond what shall be realized from the sale of the old building and grounds. The bill simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a new building to be constructed out of the proceeds of the sale of the old one suitable for the purposes for which it is to be built.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether the committee have considered a proposition that has been a good deal discussed in the Treasury Department and elsewhere as to the propriety of selling these hospitals and providing by arrangements with the city authorities for the keeping of such persons as the United States would otherwise keep, without any building. In the case of the Cleveland marine hospital, we are in favor of selling or leasing perpetually that building and making arrangements with the city authorities to keep such persons as would otherwise go to the marine hospital. It has seemed to me, from what study I have given to the subject, that a general policy applicable to nearly all cases where we have marine hospitals would be a wise one; a policy that would make arrangements with the city authorities, by paying a reasonable sum, for the keeping of such persons.

Of course I have no special knowledge as to the situation in Pittsburgh; but it seems to me that a city so far remote from the sea-coast and having to do only with the river marine could very easily make an arrangement, the United States paying a reasonable sum, for keeping and caring for such persons as ought to go into the marine hospital, which would be a very economical and wise arrangement for both parties. It would help the city in the maintenance of such persons as they needed to keep, and it would help the United States by avoiding the necessity of buying more property and building a new building. I have had some conversation with the gentleman in charge of the marine hospitals, a very intelligent gentleman indeed, especially in relation to our Cleveland hospital, and I understood him to say that he believed this arrangement could be made in most if not all of the cities of the United States. I desire to ask the gentleman from the Pittsburgh district [Mr. NEGLEY] whether, in his judgment, such a modification of the system might not be especially wise in the case of the marine hospital in his city?

Mr. NEGLEY. I have no doubt that it could be made to apply to the marine hospital at Pittsburgh, if the plan should be applied to all the marine hospitals under the control of the Government. I object to a trial of an experiment at the expense and inconvenience of the patients in the hospital at Pittsburgh. The United States Government owns a very valuable tract of land, upon which is located an old and expensive building; but being in the vicinity of railroads and manufacturing establishments it has become unsuitable for hospital purposes. By disposing of this land at the market value the Government can obtain the requisite means to purchase another piece of land and erect upon it a suitable building, with all the modern improvements, at a less cost than the amount the Government will receive for this piece of property. I will state that it is not intended to erect an expensive building, but to construct one under the rules and regulations suggested by experience and adopted latterly by the officials in charge of this service.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to move to amend, so that the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion either build a hospital, as provided by this bill, or make arrangements with the authorities of Pittsburgh for keeping the patients in the hospital.

Mr. RANDALL. That will make another hospital in Cleveland; I can see through that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. SESSIONS. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact in regard to marine hospitals, which should not be overlooked in the consideration of this question. By the revised law of 1870 and 1871 the tax which was formerly twenty cents per month upon every sailor employed in the mercantile marine of the United States was increased to forty cents per month, or doubled, solely that mariners might have hospitals in the United States where they could be taken care of when sick, or when they had received injuries. The fund from that source is enough to build hospitals of the modern pavilion style, not the old-fashioned castle hospitals with battlements reaching up to heaven and of no use here below, but the modern style of plain, simple, airy, pavilion hospitals—to build such hospitals in every sea-port in the United States where they are needed to take care of every sick, wounded, or injured sailor in our marine service.

This is a self-sustaining institution. It is not a question for the economy of gentlemen here whether the money which the sailors give, forty cents a month from their own wages, shall be appropriated to their comfort and for their support and relief. The question is for Congress to devise a proper way and the proper means in which the sailors' own money shall be expended for their own benefit. I make these remarks because, judging from other motions which have been made in relation to marine hospitals, it has been looked upon as a drain upon the Treasury.

Mr. G. F. HOAR asked a question which was not audible to the reporter.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot tell how it is about this hospital. But since the reorganization of the marine service, three or four years ago, the amount of tax upon the sailors, as I have said, was increased from twenty to forty cents per month for every month of service of every sailor employed in our mercantile marine. Under the new system which has been adopted there have been and are being made these pavilion hospitals, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and especially under the direction of the very efficient officer who has charge of this marine service. Wherever there are but a small number of patients they are provided for by contracts with private physicians or at private boarding-houses, as that seems to be the better way. But in the large centers, where many vessels arrive, it is thought desirable to have permanent hospitals.

The House will perhaps remember that by one resolution or bill and another, for some two or three years past, we have given away for educational purposes and for other purposes these old useless castle hospitals as they are called. They are utterly useless for the benefit of sailors; and the Government may as well give them away at one time as another, and build cheap, plain, airy hospitals, such as our experience during the war suggested as best adapted for the wounded and sick. That is the system now adopted, and it is working admirably. I hear of no complaint made to the Committee on Commerce or to myself, or to any one who has heretofore had charge of these matters, that that system is not performing its work well.

In my judgment it is very desirable that this old building should be given away or sold or disposed of in some way, and its place supplied by a proper pavilion hospital. Not only should this be done in Pittsburgh, but wherever these old bastile structures have been erected, nominally for the benefit of sailors, but really more like dark, gloomy prisons—they should be disposed of in some way and other hospitals erected in their stead. In that connection I advocate the passage of this bill as I would of any other bill which shall remove these old structures from actual service and build in their stead cheap, airy hospitals which are so desirable.

Mr. NEGLEY. I would state again to the House that it is not the intention to ask any appropriation from the Government. The proposition is merely to sell so much of this land as will enable the authorities to locate and build a suitable hospital elsewhere. It is merely a change of location from a low and unsuitable piece of ground to another and better.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury, if in his judgment the public interest would be better subserved, may, instead of building a hospital, contract with the authorities of the city of Pittsburgh to care for such persons as are now cared for in the marine hospitals of the United States.

Mr. SESSIONS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. That will enable the Secretary of the Treasury, if he finds the facts to be as I think them to be, to avoid the necessity of building a new hospital.

Mr. SPEER. If it is the intention of Congress to adopt that policy, then let a general bill for that purpose be introduced and passed. But why should Congress attempt to ingraft general legislation upon a bill providing for the erection of a single hospital in a single city?

Mr. CONGER. The power contemplated by the amendment now exists by law in regard to every hospital.

Mr. SPEER. This bill does not provide for the expenditure of a single dollar of public money in addition to what shall be received from the sale of the old property. By reason of the improvement and development of the city of Pittsburgh, the ground upon which the present hospital is located can be sold for a great deal more money than will suffice for the purchase of suitable grounds elsewhere for a new building; and the difference between the price of the present grounds and the sum necessary to purchase new ground can be devoted to the erection of a more suitable building, better fitted for the use to which the Government intends to devote it. This is a bill which appeals to the humanity and justice of this House, and I am surprised that any gentleman, especially one who does not live in the city of Pittsburgh or the State of Pennsylvania, should attempt for any reason to thwart the passage of a measure so laudable in its objects.

The amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX. In the confusion prevailing in the Hall, I doubt whether the bill just passed was properly understood. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

Mr. SPEER. Did the gentleman vote with the majority?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether he did or not; the vote was viva voce, and any member has the right to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to have the bill read?

The SPEAKER. It has been read twice; but if the gentleman so desires it can be read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. COX. May I say one word on this subject?

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is not that the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX?]

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the gentleman from New York has moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and he intimated, as the Chair thought, that it had not been understood by the House. The bill was very fully debated, and gentlemen should not make their own inattention to business a matter of reproach upon the House.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman was in his seat when the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill was quite fully discussed; and the Chair never relishes an intimation of that kind.

Mr. COX. The Chair is always very just to me—more so than I deserve. I wish to say one thing upon this subject. Secretary McCulloch once said that the maintenance of these marine hospitals cost more than it would cost to board each of the inmates at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York. If we had time to examine the matter, we might abandon our policy in respect to these hospitals. I have been through some of them myself, and I know what they are.

Mr. NEGLEY. Was the gentleman in the hospitals during the war?

Mr. RANDALL. I want to direct attention to the fact that the funds by which these hospitals are supported come from the sailors themselves, not from the Government.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NEGLEY to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, it was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL PENITENTIARIES.

Mr. WELLS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 440) to amend the act entitled "An act transferring the control of certain territorial penitentiaries to the several Territories in which the same are located," approved January 24, 1873.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that the act entitled "An act transferring the control of certain territorial penitentiaries to the several Territories in which the same are located," approved January 24, 1873, be amended by striking out the words Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming wherever the same occur in said act, and the said act shall hereafter have no applicability to the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming. The second section provides that the penitentiaries in the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming shall continue under the care and control of the marshal of the United States for said Territories, under and pursuant to the provisions of the act entitled "An act in relation to certain territorial penitentiaries," approved January 10, 1871; which said last-mentioned act is thereby revived and re-enacted so far as the same applies to the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is a report accompanying this bill I should like to hear it.

The report was read. It states that the facts in reference to this bill are that on the 10th day of January, 1871, an act of Congress was approved whereby the United States penitentiaries of Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming were placed under the charge of the United States marshals who were charged with the care and control of persons convicted of offenses against the laws of the United States; and which act further authorized the Attorney-General to contract with the several authorities of the Territories to maintain therein all persons convicted of offenses against territorial laws, at the cost of keeping and maintaining the same. The Territories thereupon, repealing their prison laws, authorized their respective governors to enter into contract with the Attorney-General to keep the prisoners with those of the United States; and such contracts, at the prices stipulated by Mr. Hoar, then Attorney-General, were entered into in good faith by the several Territories and all territorial prison systems, wardens, and officers, being no longer needed in said Territories, were abolished, and the laws creating the same repealed.

On the 24th day of January, 1873, an act of Congress was passed which transferred the use and control of these United States penitentiaries to the territorial authorities, the United States retaining the ownership and title of the buildings, and so far modifying the original act as to reverse the positions of the parties—the United States marshals being directed to surrender their control of the United States prisoners to the territorial authorities and to contract with them for their care and maintenance; in short, that the United States should now pay the Territories for keeping their prisoners, whereas under the old law the Territories paid the United States.

It appears that in most instances the United States had the greater number of prisoners, and that the marshals and their deputies took care of the same and of the territorial prisoners. The Territories have now no wardens or other officers to receive these prisoners, nor any prison system, nor can any such be created without calling special sessions of the territorial Legislatures, which would cost the United States from thirty to fifty thousand dollars, one Legislature having been already convened to make these laws at an expense of $15,000 to the United States; whereas under the old law the United States marshals maintained these prisoners without any greater cost to the Government than would now be required to pay the Territories to keep the same, even if the Territories should agree to accept the prisons and take charge of the United States convicts at all.

Under these circumstances the Attorney-General could not, nor has he enforced the law, but has merely awaited the action of Congress. The committee plainly perceives that to call special sessions of the Legislatures to transfer these prisons would be a loss to the United States, while it would injure the Territories to maintain a prison organization to perform duties which can as well be performed by the existing officers of the United States, who will keep their prisoners for the exact cost of their maintenance and control, and probably at better terms than they can keep them themselves.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES CUSTOM-HOUSE, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

Mr. MILLIKEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2029) for the protection of the United States custom-house in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be empowered and directed to purchase from the owner or owners thereof, at a price not to exceed $12,500, all that certain piece of ground in the city of Louisville, county of Jefferson, and State of Kentucky, situate west of and adjoining the United States custom-house, fronting twenty-five feet on Green street, and extending back one hundred and fifty feet, parallel with and the same depth as the custom-house property; and for that purpose the sum of $12,500, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, be and is thereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided, however, that no part of the money thereby appropriated shall be paid or expended until a clear, perfect, and absolute title in fee-simple to the ground shall have been secured and conveyed to the United States by a good and sufficient deed of general warranty.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I make the point of order that the bill makes an appropriation, and therefore must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE CITADEL ACADEMY, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. MILLIKEN, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (H. R. No. 835) authorizing and directing the rebuilding of the west wing of the building in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, occupied by United States troops, known as "the Citadel Academy," and making an appropriation for the same, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE LIBRARY.

Mr MILLIKEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the following resolution for action:

Resolved, That the Supervising Architect of the Capitol building be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to convert the space over the colonnade at the south end of the old Hall of Representatives into a room for the extension of the House Library and fit up the same with shelves for books; and he is further authorized and directed to fit up with shelves a sufficient number of rooms in the basement story of the east wing of the Capitol building to accommodate all of the House library books not shelved after filling the colonnade as aforesaid; and for this purpose the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order on that resolution that it makes an appropriation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Let it be considered in the House, as in Committee, under the five-minute rule, and with the consent of the House I will state my reason for it. The evil which the passage of this resolution is asked to correct is one growing greater every day. Every gentleman of the House who will step up to the House Library will see for himself the absolute necessity for more room to store books. They are daily accumulating, and already they are piled up in such confusion that it is almost impossible for the librarians to properly perform their duty. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have carefully considered this whole matter, assisted by the officers of the House and by the architect of the Capitol, and the means suggested here are the cheapest and most feasible for the purpose of securing necessary accommodations. This is a necessary thing to do, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow the resolution to be considered now as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the resolution makes an appropriation, is well taken.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I make the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow it to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. We have rules, and let us live up to them. I was willing to yield to hear the gentleman from Virginia make his statement, but I do not withdraw my point of order.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. WOODFORD. I am directed by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1540) to prevent officers of the United States receiving or being paid any money beyond their fixed salaries, with a substitute.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the substitute will alone be read.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What is the bill for which it is a substitute?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the original bill.

The SPEAKER. It is always in order to call for the reading of the original bill.

The Clerk read the original bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no officer or employé of the United States shall receive or be paid, directly or indirectly, any money or property under the name of contingent expenses, or any other name or form, beyond his legally established salary, except in cases of customs informers; and that no public property shall be used by officials for private purposes.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the payment from the Treasury of all actual and necessary traveling expenses of United States officials when performing the legitimate and necessary duties pertaining to their offices.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That no officer of the United States shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or be paid to or for his own use or benefit any money or property whatever of the United States, except a salary to be fixed by law; and that no public property shall be used by officials or by any persons for private purposes.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the payment from the Treasury of the actual and necessary traveling expenses of United States officials when performing the legitimate and necessary duties pertaining to their offices.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New York who has charge of the bill to add after the word "salary" the words "or compensation." A large number of officers are paid by fees, or are paid in ways which cannot be properly described as a salary. There are those who receive a per-diem pay. If the gentleman will add the words "or compensation," the language will be broad enough to cover them all.

Mr. WOODFORD. I accept the amendment of the gentleman, which I understand is to insert after the word "salary" the words "or compensation."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would the gentleman from New York allow the bill to be further amended by inserting the words, "or make any private profit or use of the labor or services of any person employed by the United States?"

Mr. WOODFORD. He would personally be willing to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the substitute may be again read.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill how it will affect a class of officers who have hitherto been paid very largely by the emoluments of the office aside from the salary? I mean the collectors at our ports. Does he intend to restrict them hereafter to their salaries eo nomine as they are established by law?

Mr. WOODFORD. He does.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call the regular order. It is now half-past one.

Mr. WOODFORD. I have no objection to that if the bill can go over till the morning hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The bill necessarily goes over; but the Chair will first have the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] read.

Mr. CONGER. Is the bill liable to the point of order that it requires an appropriation and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It would have been. But it has been discussed by half a dozen gentlemen.

Mr. CONGER. The discussion was in regard to what the bill was, and I was waiting patiently to make my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not observe the gentleman making any motion that way.

Mr. WOODFORD. Amendments have been offered, and I accepted one with consent of the House, and intimated my willingness to accept another. That certainly is equivalent to a partial consideration, because the fullest debate and a vote thereon could have accomplished no more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair naturally supposed that some gentleman would make the point of order, and looked round, but observed no gentleman rising for that purpose.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I send to the desk the amendment which I desire to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "fixed by law" insert "or make any private profit or use of the labor or service of any person employed by the United States, which labor or service is paid for by the United States."

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the bill and the amendments which have been suggested may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the substitute being treated as an original bill. It will be printed; the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] will also be printed, and the bill will go over in the morning hour with that amendment pending.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I send to the desk an amendment which I desire may also be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to insert the words "or compensation," to be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to insist on my point of order on the bill. I think any gentleman who takes the earlist opportunity to get the attention of the Chair to make a point of order should be allowed to make it.

The SPEAKER. How early did the gentleman seek the attention of the Chair?

Mr. CONGER. As soon as the Chair determined that the substitute was the bill before the House. I made the point of order before there was any discussion on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the bill was read. The substitute was then read. The gentleman from Ohio who offered an amendment discussed it. The gentleman who had charge of the bill discussed it briefly, admitting the amendment, which was agreed to. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts offered an amendment verbally, which the Chair said had better be reduced to writing. The gentleman reduced it to writing. And after all that transpired the gentleman from Michigan comes and insists on the point of order, which as the Chair thinks was too late.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair decided that the substitute should be considered, and that was the first time there was an opportunity to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in error; the Chair did not decide that point.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair said so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said he understood there was no objection to the substitute being considered as an original bill.

Mr. CONGER. And at that moment I raised my point of order.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman objects to its being so treated, that point of order is good.

Mr. CONGER. I will object, then, to its being so treated.

The SPEAKER. That point of order is good. The gentleman from Michigan insists that the substitute shall not be treated as an original bill, but that there shall be a vote whether it shall be put in the place of the original bill. That point of order is good; but the Chair thought that the gentleman was making a point of order that the bill should go the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman's present point of order will not help him to get the bill into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The Chair thought there was a general agreement that the substitute should be treated as an original bill.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair suggested a substitute for my point of order which partly misled me. I am not responsible for the Chair's misleading me or any other member by his suggestions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot always understand what is in the mind of the gentleman from Michigan. He only knows what he speaks. The Chair distinctly remembers that the gentleman did not rise to make the point of order. He may have intended to do so; but good intentions are not always valuable in the House.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say this, if the Chair pleases, for myself and other members of the House. I am not speaking of this particular case, but I have repeatedly addressed the Speaker without being able to catch his attention to a motion which I have wished to make or to remarks that I have wished to make, because the attention of the Speaker was directed to those who are larger bodies in this House.

The SPEAKER. Generally on account of the noise which the gentleman's associates on the floor are making around him.

Mr. CONGER. If the Speaker pleases, if I had control of the noise I would be responsible for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds it impossible to control all the members, and oftentimes equally as impossible to control the gentleman from Michigan as any other.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WOODFORD. Will the Chair kindly state to the House the position of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in the morning hour, and will come up tomorrow as soon as the morning hour begins. The first question will be on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] The Chair understands that the bill and the substitute and the amendments will be severally printed.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to have an amendment printed.

Mr. WOODFORD. The gentleman from Maryland asked permission to offer an amendment for the purpose of having it printed, and I understood the Chair to recognize him.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman admit the amendment?

Mr. WOODFORD. I am willing that it shall be offered and printed.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to ask a question. The Chair often intimates to members of the House that it may be necessary to mention them by name. I desire to ask the Chair whether there has ever been anything in my conduct in this House that required him to suppose me to be more disorderly than other gentlemen, as he said just now it was impossible to keep the member from Michigan in order?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair only stated that he found it equally impossible; he only put the gentleman from Michigan on the same level with other members.

Mr. CONGER. The member from Michigan has endeavored to so conduct himself in this House as not to be liable to such censure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not make any censure in any shape or form; it was the furthest from his thought to do any such thing.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House now resumes the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. COBURN. I yield for a moment to my colleague, [Mr. CASON.]

Mr. CASON. I desire to submit an amendment for the purpose of having it go into the RECORD and be printed. It is in the nature of an amendment to the motion to recommit. It proposes to recommit the bill with instructions to report a substitute.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that in order?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. As the substitute has not been read I desire to reserve points of order upon it.

The SPEAKER. All the gentleman from Indiana desires is to have his amendment printed as an expression of what he would desire to offer. It is in the form of an amendment to the motion to recommit, and if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] should withdraw the motion to recommit, the amendment itself would be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection to the printing of the amendment.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Resolved, That the motion to recommit bill No. 1572, the same being a bill to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, be amended so that said bill be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report a bill incorporating the following principles as a substitute for the bill now before the House:

1. That all national banking shall be free, upon the following basis:

2. The Government to issue bonds bearing a rate of interest at 3.65 per cent. per annum, to be deposited by banks with the Secretary of the Treasury as security for the redemption of their currency, and shall be payable in — years in gold and silver coin.

3. That all banks heretofore organized shall upon their incorporation be required to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury said 3.65 per cent. bonds at the ratio of the amount of $60,000 for every $50,000 of currency furnished to any such banks, as hereinafter provided.

4. That the national banks now organized shall be required in a reasonable time to give up all bonds now held by them on deposit with the Government as security for the redemption of their circulation which bear a higher rate of interest than 4 per cent. per annum, and deposit in place thereof said bonds bearing a rate of interest of 3.65 per cent. per annum.

5. That all banks hereafter incorporated, before completing their organization, shall be required to take up the outstanding bonds of the Government which bear a rate of interest not less than 5 per cent. per annum and deliver the same to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation and destruction to an amount equal to the 3.65 per cent. bonds which such bank may desire to deposit with said Secretary of the Treasury as security for its circulating medium.

6. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued certificates of circulation, as money, of different denominations, which shall be payable by some national bank, and shall bear no interest, but which certificates the Government will guarantee the payment of in the event that the bank in which any such certificates shall be payable shall be unable to redeem the same, the Government to indemnify itself by the sale or cancellation of the 3.65 per cent. bonds held by the Secretary of the Treasury from such bank as security for the redemption of its circulation. And which certificates of circulation shall be furnished to each national bank in the ratio of $50,000 for every $60,000 in 3.65 per cent. bonds deposited by any such bank with the Secretary of the Treasury. Each bank receiving said certificates to reimburse the Government the cost of the issue of the same, and be required to redeem the same in gold or silver coin, legal-tender notes, Treasury notes, or 3.65 per cent. Government bonds.

7. That the national banks now organized shall be required within a reasonable time to take up their present circulation and deliver the same to the Secretary of the Treasury to be canceled and destroyed, and in lieu thereof receive, as hereinbefore provided, certificates of circulation.

8. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to exchange said certificates of circulation, bank-notes, Treasury notes, or bonds bearing a higher rate of interest for said 3.65 per cent. bonds. And when said exchange may have been made for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 4 per cent. the same shall be canceled and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And when the Secretary of the Treasury shall receive certificates of circulation, bank-notes, legal-tender, or Treasury notes not bearing interest in exchange as aforesaid, he shall from time to time, with the same, redeem such outstanding bonds that are by law redeemable and which bear a higher rate of interest than 4 per cent., and cause said bonds to be canceled and destroyed.

9. That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to issue a portion of said 3.65 per cent. bonds in denominations of $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100 bonds, and that he and all national banks that are depositories of public moneys shall be authorized to exchange the same for certificates of circulation, legal-tender notes, or Treasury notes not bearing interest, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause from time to time to be redeemed therewith United States bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 4 per cent. per annum, and cause said bonds to be canceled and destroyed. And that said Secretary of the Treasury and said banks of deposit may in like manner exchange said certificate of circulation, legal-tender, or Treasury notes for said 3.65 per cent. bonds: Provided, That said 3.65 per cent. bonds shall not draw interest while in the hands of said Secretary of the Treasury, or in the hands of said banks of deposit for the use of the United States: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require from all banks of deposit satisfactory security for the safe-keeping, accounting for, and the prompt payment of said moneys and bonds.

10. That hereafter national banks shall pay no interest on deposits except when there is a direct loan of a specific sum of money for a definite time and a written obligation given at the time of the loan specifying the rate of interest to be paid.

11. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall at all times retain the overplus of all bonds in his hands, or the proceeds thereof, until after the circulation of any bank may have been redeemed; which overplus shall be used if necessary to secure and pay any deposits that may remain unpaid by such bank after its circulation has been fully redeemed. Also, the Secretary of the Treasury shall retain all interest that may become due on the bonds of any bank deposited with said Secretary of the Treasury to secure the redemption of its circulation, until said interest so reserved shall amount to one-fifth part of the par value of all such bonds so deposited with said Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such banks may from time to time pay out of their reserves, now by law required to be kept on hand by said banks, a sum equal to that of the interest so retained by said Secretary of the Treasury.

12. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required and directed to so control the redemption and payment of the bonded debt of the Government as at all times to have in the Treasury of the United States a sufficient sum of money to carry out the foregoing provisions; that section 12 of an act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, approved June 3, 1864, be so amended as to require all shareholders of any bank failing and winding up its business to be responsible to the depositors of such bank, after its assets may have been exhausted, in a sum not exceeding double the amount of the par value of the capital stock held by each shareholder.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Speaker, after what has been said in this masterly discussion of all matters pertaining to our currency, I hesitate to proceed. I feel that I can add but little to what has been already said, and that I may only prolong the hour when decisive action shall take place The whole nation has waited anxiously for the day when the conclusion shall be reached; and as month after month has been consumed in legislation upon other subjects, the loud and impatient cries of many thousands for prompt and radical action swell upon every breeze.

DOES THE WEST LACK CAPITAL OR CURRENCY?

It has been said in debate, and re-repeated by the opponents of additional circulation, that we in the West and South do not need currency so much as capital; that we are destitute of capital and have no right to currency. We are disposed to contradict this assumption, and if we had a less respectable source of evidence than the census tables might feel some hesitation in doing so, in view of the positive and arrogant manner in which the assertion is made. These tables show that we have wealth and capital in abundance; perhaps not in as great abundance as the older and more boastful States, but quite enough to command respect and to silence those who so insolently make the declaration. I will read a statement from the census tables showing what I say is true. The following figures indicate the values of all property in 1870 in the States named:

Connecticut	$774, 631, 524
Rhode Island	296, 965, 646
Massachusetts	2, 132, 148, 741
Illinois	2, 121, 680, 579
Indiana	1, 268, 180, 543
Missouri	1, 284, 922, 807
Iowa	717, 644, 750
Michigan	719, 208, 118
Ohio	2, 235, 433, 300
Wisconsin	702, 307, 329

The national banking facilities of the three States first named are per capita about fourfold those of the States last named. Capital seems to be in sufficient quantities in those Western States, while currency is lacking.

The cool effrontery of this assertion of the lack of capital is only equaled by that of him who would reason with the man who was athirst to convince him that he was not dry instead of giving him water, or with another who was shivering and freezing to convince him that he was not cold instead of giving him clothing. The man who has water and clothes may argue till doomsday but he can produce no effect. A want was never supplied by an argument, much less by a threat or a sneer. The man who has land, but who has no plows, hoes, harness, or teams, is in want of them when he goes to cultivate the soil. The land is one kind of capital, the implements of husbandry are another. Suppose the owner of these latter would refuse to sell them to the farmer because he did not need them and ought in his opinion not to have them; and suppose in addition he added the sneer that the landholder had no capital and could not cultivate a farm even if he had the tools. That would be regarded both as impudence and nonsense. But that seems to be the way the opponents of western and southern banks talk.

The soil needs cultivation, the country needs the currency, the tools of business; must the land lie idle when the implements of the farm can be had? Must business stand still or perish because the tools are locked up? This is the question. This is what is before us. The legal-tender note, the bank-note, the bank-check, the draft, the bill of exchange, these are the ready tools of business; shall they be placed where they can be honestly and handily obtained for value by the people?

Let nobody spring up and say that it is proposed to give them away, or to shuffle them off to speculators. Let no one say that we do not intend to allow them to go fairly into the clean hands of honest men for full value. The people demand more of the circulating medium, and it becomes a grave question whether it is really needed; if needed, in what form; and if that be settled, to what extent?

I need not enter into an argument or discussion to show the nature of the legal-tender notes. It does become a matter of some importance to have distinct views as to the origin and uses of our national banks. I prefer to look at the practical rather than the legal aspects of the iscussion.

We have now a vast national banking system, in which the entire business of the country is interwoven, involving all the interests of the nation, and to overthrow it would prove disastrous in the extreme. The loans of these banks average more than double their circulation; their deposits are counted in a still greater sum. To withdraw their bonds, to call in their loans, and to pay out their deposits preparatory to going out of business would exhaust the means of the banks for a time, and so cripple and convulse business as to bring on incalculable misfortunes. We must deal with them as they are, and take things as we find them. I once favored a redistribution of these banks, and had it been done some of the ills we complain of might have been averted. But the older States remonstrate against redistribution; prophesy that it will bring bankruptcy upon them, and contend so stoutly for what they have that for one I am willing to adopt another line of policy, and favor the equalization of banks by allowing to the newer portions of the country an equivalent share. This will satisfy all parties who are disposed to be reasonable.

To those who have already more than their share, and who are unwilling that the States unsupplied shall have their complement, I have only to commend the reading of the fable of the dog in the manger. I have no argument other or longer than that for such gentlemen.

If abundant banking facilities are a benefit to those who have them, why shall they be denied to those who have them not and desire them? Will it be unsafe to trust the unsupplied States? What is there in them that leads to a doubt as to their ability to do a safe banking business? Surely the West and South have had in former years a surfeit of bad currency and bad banks, and now know by experience that the present paper currency is as much better than their old circulation as gold is better than greenbacks. This money is good everywhere; is not subject to the ruinous rates of exchange that attached to local bank paper. It can be sent or carried to the remotest points, and incurs no discount.

FORMATION AND USES OF BANKS.

An inquiry into the nature of banks in this country may prove profitable. How is a bank originated and established? Is it a growth, like that of an oak? Is it a natural object, like a mountain? Is it even a fortune, a mass of wealth, like the fortune and the wealth of Girard, Astor, or Stewart? It is not. A bank is not necessarily composed of the money of one rich man or more. A bank is a mere accumulation of means; it may be established where wealth has no existence and luxury is a mere name. A bank is made up of the contributions in a business way of its stockholders. Take an agricultural district, composed of comfortable, well-to-do farmers; a large number, say five hundred, put in on an average a thousand dollars each, and you have a very respectable bank; let them put in two thousand each, and they have a strong, a powerful bank. The farmers in many a county in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, and other States can do this, and in some measure do it. Numerous banks, ranging from fifty to two hundred thousand dollars capital, are thus formed. They need not stint or strain themselves to do so. If banking is profitable to them, why should they not make this investment? If they can put in the security, why shall they not have the image and superscription of the Government put on their notes?

Certainly there is no danger that practical men as they are will embark in the business of banking if it is unprofitable. They are less likely to do so than the crowded denizens of cities. They need no guardian in this respect. They only need that freedom to choose and to invest that men in the older States have. These sound-headed, cool men are not in danger of flooding the country with useless notes. They need banks in their communities to do the local business, which at times is quite large. They can thus help each other by a common accumulation, to which all may resort and obtain help. Sound management will teach them how to obtain and retain the supply for common use. The nation may lend them her name, and for this attach some wholesome provisions, some judicious restraints, some safeguards in administration; but the great object is obtained when the circulation is secured beyond all possibility of a loss to the bill-holder. There is a sphere of business management into which the Government cannot enter, which is essentially private, and in which the stockholders and their customers take mutually the risk of profit or loss.

A bank is a center of business for a community. It enables the people to obtain accommodations without the inconvenience of travel; it enables a man of limited acquaintance to borrow money who could not go abroad and do so; it gives to the neighborhood the profits on all the loans; it is a hive for the circulation of surrounding business mens it localizes a certain amount of it, and holds it ready for use. The idea of the distribution of the currency by the distribution of bank; is not a myth, is not a fallacy. True enough, the establishment of i bank does not at once create wealth or capital; but it organizes at. It is like the recruiting of an army; it does not make men, but it assembles them; it puts them into form and order, where they exercise tremendous power. And when it is said that to allow banking in the regions where it is not does not of itself make a dollar more, nobody will contradict that; but if it be said that the result of a bank so organized is nothing, I dispute it. Just as well tell me that because recruiting does not create men, an assembled army has no power and will do nothing.

Put a bank into operation in any rich and populous county where there is not now one, and the result is soon seen. It never fails to appear in just one way, and that is that business is greatly aided. Nobody is so silly as to argue or expect that capital will spring up where it is not because a law is passed. The trouble is banks are by law prevented from springing up where capital is already. That is what redistribution of the currency means. The man who lives in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, who has all around him these banks, knows this, and holds on to his bank-stock and refuses to let his western and southern neighbor have any. He hoots and sneers at them as having no capital, nothing to make a bank with, but takes good care not to let him have a chance to do so. This may be good financiering, but is not good neighborship; it is not decent; it is greediness; it is shabby selfishness. The man that does so will suffer for it in some way at some time, and be taught that to live and let live is the best policy.

It is said if more banks are established and they are distributed ever so widely the money will, after all, float to the great centers; that it will circulate, that it will find its way from the banks of issue, and be absorbed into the general mass of currency. This may be, and no doubt is, true, and yet does not meet the case, which is this: that other currency of equal value fills its place; that a receptacle, a reservoir, for instance, has been created into which this money flows, and it makes no difference from what bank it comes, it is just as available as if it were the issues of the local bank. No man pretends that the circulation can be localized, but an equal amount is, and the effect is just the same.

The expansion produced by the use of mercantile paper is what every healthy business community wants, and should not be denied. The amount of business done by checks, drafts, and bills of exchange is much greater than that done by currency itself. In the great cities the proportion of currency is very small, not over 5 per cent.; in others, 10 to 15 per cent.; in others, a still greater proportion, up to 40 or 50 per cent. This rate increases in the rural districts, where experience shows the need of more currency to do the same amount of business.

The whole country has come to understand the uses of banks and their convenience just as well as they understand the uses of steam machinery, and the thousand labor-saving devices of the last fifty years. The bank is not a mere place from which circulating notes issue, but a higher, wider, much more extensive use for them is demanded and obtained; a use which will at no distant day largely dispense with the handling of currency, and enable the people, through checks, drafts, and the clearing-house, in all wide-awake communities, to transact the greater part of their business. Banks may be badly managed, and so may railroads, steamboats, telegraphs, and the art of printing, but they stand among the essential features of the modern business world.

Whether the United States shall furnish the circulation composed of her own notes, or notes secured by her bonds, or allow private corporations to do so, as before the war, is a question yet to be settled, and one about which there is very serious doubt and question in the minds of many men. My belief is that the best paper circulation is that issued by the United States based on her own credit; that it is cheaper, safer, and just as convenient as any other; that ultimately the Government will be the true center of paper redemption, and can do it to better advantage than individuals can, and under safe management will be the only constant, reliable, and competent existence that can meet all runs, defy all panics, and overthrow all rings. I believe that the Treasury of the United States, if this nation is worthy to live as an honorable and progressive Government, will be the sole instrument that can strike down all financial combinations and give to the people security in trade and regularity in monetary transactions. Without some such agent we must drift to and fro under the influence of the great corporations that have grown into such enormous proportions and are yet but in their infancy.

I believe that the time will come, if a policy of United States notes is adopted, when the Government will be able to have on hand such a reserve fund of specie as will place beyond question the efforts of speculators to tamper for one moment with the price of gold.

Just now there seems to be a dread in the minds of many that to issue United States notes is the certain way to bankruptcy; that to begin is to embark in an unlimited course of expansion which will end in the depreciation and dishonor of our paper currency. I have no dread of such consequences. I participate in no such lack of confidence in my fellow-men. I sympathize with no such contemptible opinion of those who shall succeed me in public life. That mankind is endowed with ordinary discretion, that our people are not ready to commit monetary suicide, that they have some little business sagacity left, I have no earthly doubt. But this whole theory of horror at the embarkation into an illimitable sea of irredeemable promises goes upon this presumption. I prefer rather to presume that our nation will at present and in the future act with a fair amount of common sense.

IT IS SAFE TO INCREASE BANKS.

At present the public mind seems turned away from the issue of United States notes to a system of national banks more or less free. This currency is safe, is better than any other paper circulation we ever had before, except the greenbacks, and is acceptable to the people. It will not be harmful to enlarge it if the demands of business require it. The addition of fifty-four millions to this kind of currency since 1870 has had no effect to depreciate it, and in my judgment as many dollars more would, instead of weakening, strengthen the credit of the country and give aid to all business enterprises.

I would not favor the policy proposed by some to allow absolute free banking. The Eastern and Middle States have now more than their due proportion of national banks, and it is but fair to restrict all new banks to those States that have not their due proportion. When something like equality is established it will be time to talk about free banking, not till then. The result of the stem now would be to induce too many persons to go into the business; inflation would be the consequence; banking would grow unprofitable, and then contraction would follow, and the fluctuations consequent upon expansions and contractions would be inevitable. The evils of redundancy would probably be felt in a short time, and the complaints of the past year as to an unsettled currency would be doubled. A gradual increase of currency in the States not in excess seems to be the most advisable plan, giving relief in such a shape as to give no sudden start to speculations. If $50,000,000 additional bank circulation were allowed to the newer States, to be taken by them during the next twelve months, and if not all taken by them at that time, the remainder to go to the older States, this, it seems to me, would operate so gradually that business could easily adjust itself to it. Twenty-five millions more might be allowed the second year in case the $50,000,000 were an insufficient supply.

An unlimited circulation is to be avoided, and has no demand in the business of the country.

A RESERVE NEEDED.

We are now laboring under the effects of a panic which arose not from a depreciation in currency or a lack of confidence in it, but in its scarcity. The breaking up of a great banking-house was the signal; and when dealers in currency, bankers, and business men began to look about and count up their currency, they found that there was a remarkable scarcity of the article. Where it was no one could tell; the pulses were felt all around, and the same condition was found everywhere. "No money!" "No money!" was the cry. There was the same property, the same business, there were the same men; but the public brain was stunned by the inquiry for currency. A man in health drops down with apoplexy. An engine with full power suddenly stops. Men stand aghast, as they did when the money panic occurred, and no one can tell why it is. Perhaps the very force of the man and the machine was the cause of death and ruin. So it seemed in our panic. No one can say that business was generally in an unhealthy state. The crops were good; the factories, shops, and mills were at work; the demand for all articles of trade, commerce, and merchandise was fair; railroads, banks, insurance companies, and foreign trade were in a flattering condition. There had been no fire, no famine, no pestilence, no war, no drain upon the resources of the people. The alarm sounded and the whole machinery of society stopped—stopped not because it had broken, but simply the little supply of water had been cut off or diverted. Had there been a little tank, a little reservoir, a little streamlet, to have added to the supply, this would not have happened. But that little supply had been nowhere provided, that little reserve had not been thought of by the workmen who planned and put up the ponderous machinery that drove the nation through the waves of the most tremendous civil war mankind ever witnessed. It was a slight omission; but at last the day came when its use was essential, and then for the want of it the machinery stopped. There was no legitimate reserve to which the people could resort. There was a miserable make-shift called one in the hands of an alarmed Secretary, which was in dispute, and which had none of the true attributes of a reserve—a fund to be let out at the discretion of that officer, a fund only to be had when the panic was a fixed fact, a fund which ought to be intrusted to no mortal man to distribute, but which should come out only on the imperative and overbearing demands of business and business men, to be drawn upon at their discretion, and only when they felt the grinding and pinching of scarcity upon them.

If the panic taught one lesson it was that there should be a reserve of currency in the hands of the Government to be used not at the discretion of any officer, but at the discretion of him who would deposit ample security for it. This was the lesson of the hour above all other things; a lesson which I fear has not been learned, which had no part in the four hundred million bill we passed last week, and has not a notice in the bill now under consideration. The nation wanted temporary relief, and only temporary relief, just as the engine out of steam and out of water soon can be put in motion by the simple supply of a little of the things needful. Had this supply been furnished promptly it is questionable whether the effects of the panic would have been felt beyond those having business connections with Jay Cooke and Company.

There were thousands of people in the land who had bonds with which to draw money from the Treasury when the interest rose upon legal-tenders to such a degree as to justify it. The currency could have been brought out; there was no lack of security, there was no lack of confidence in the Government; there was simply no way by which that currency, which would have kept the channels of business open, could be reached by any amount of security.

The question for us to decide now is will we let this occasion pass, so full of warnings, and fail to provide against a similar emergency? Can we do it safely? Is there any obstacle in the way? I see none. The amount of fifty millions might be provided in the Treasury to be drawn upon at the option of the bondholder, the sum drawn to be held by him for a limited time, say six months, he surrendering the interest during deposit to the Government, and when the time fixed for the redemption of his bonds expires the same to be redeemable by any other person. This would insure their being taken up and would effectually retire the reserve after an emergency.

But it is said that we ought to go down to specie payments in order to be able to draw on the world for currency when a panic recurs. This is a sure way to provide a reserve in coin, it is true, but it would be after such a period of collapse, bankruptcy, contraction, and financial ruin as would leave few business men to take advantage of this dear-bought reserve. We could get such reserve by bringing all of our paper circulation within the compass of $200,000,000, but not before that time, for there is but little over half of that amount of gold in the country according to the best calculators. Such a reserve could only be reached by a thousand-fold worse panic than the one recently passed, and which one can hardly conceive a lover of his country could propose.

The plan of convertible bonds will cost the people and the Government for every dollar that is drawn out 3.65 per cent. The plan that I propose is just 8.65 or 9.65 better than that, according as you issue 5 or 6 per cent bonds. I propose to save interest to the United States. In the other instance the Government loses 3.65. Why shall the people of this country be taxed to make a reserve? Why shall they be taxed to pay interest on the deposits of idle and lazy money-holders? I can conceive of no proposition more impracticable.

But it is said that we have too much currency; that we have more now in proportion than we had fifteen years ago, and before the war, and that then the full limit of expansion was reached by State and local banks. Now, why is it said that we had enough of circulation before the war? Such men fail to tell the House, and I venture to say they never will.

No man can say we had a sufficiency of good currency before the war. A sufficiency of currency never existed in the West or South. It is very well known to every one from those sections that we had a lot of the most miserable shin-plasters that human ingenuity, and I might almost say devilish ingenuity, could invent. There was not at any period of five years from my earliest recollection down to the war a time when there were not great fluctuations in the value of all our money. Take the most respectable banks, the State Bank of Indiana, for instance, which paid gold when no other State bank in the Union paid it, and you could not take a ten-dollar note of its issue as far as the State of Tennessee, or Missouri, or Pennsylvania, without its depreciation and without having to submit to a shave. No man, then, need tell me that we ever had a currency in this country up to the true amount of necessary circulation, for our money was depreciated the very moment you began to travel from home and lost its value as you proceeded. Eastern money that was good at home was constantly shaved, and when depreciated was bought up by eastern agents at a discount and taken home where it was at par. We had an enormous amount of discredited stuff, composed of individual shin-plasters, plank-road notes, private-bankers' promises, insurance-company notes, free-bank notes, and State-bank notes. Nothing could exceed the varieties of our paper money coming from all quarters and ranging over all prices from par to 1 per cent. This currency was in the main confined to the immediate locality of its issue, for it could not find the least credit at any distance from home. Even a good State-bank bill had little currency beyond its borders. This paper then had not sufficient credit to give it an opportunity to become a test of the quantity of circulation needed by the people; it lost all ability to travel almost before it started on its journey. The amount of paper circulation before the war was no test whatever of the demands of business and every man who reflects one moment will say so.

The comparison is then made with England to show that they have less circulation than we have to the man. This, in the first place, is a mistake. They have more, if I am not misinformed. And in the next place there is a great difference in situation, extent of country, distance from cities, mode of life, and independent employment of our people, that puts them in a position to demand more money than Englishmen. All of our real estate is in market in addition to our personal property. This doubles the material for trade and traffic. This is not the case in England or in Europe generally. There a system of entail ties landed estates up for ages. We may not need an increase of money in proportion to the increase of property and business, but we do need a considerable addition. Common sense teaches this, and he who seeks to cut short a reasonable supply of currency to meet the demands of business shuts his eyes to the great facts in the progress of the nation, if indeed he ever had the capacity to see them. A reasonable addition is consistent with the growth and true progress of the country, and is not to be feared. The nonsense about confederate money, and wild-cat shin-plasters, and assignats, all based on the folly or dishonesty of the projectors, is thrown in by some as an argument against a currency founded on the faith of the nation, made secure by its solemn pledge, given in time of war and reiterated after its close, and made perfectly reliable by the unexampled ability and cheerfulness of the people in supplying the revenues and paying the taxes as they fall due. And right here rests the true basis of all of our currency. While the people cheerfully and readily pay taxes the currency can never be discredited, notwithstanding public men decry it as lies, mockery, repudiation, and shame; thus doing more to blast the reputation of their country and befoul its fair name than they could by any device of wickedness short of rebellion and treason.

These notes are currency, not gold; and everybody knows it. The man who takes them is not deceived or cheated as to what they are; they pay debts, and answer every purpose that currency can between our people. Those who take them do not expect them to be exchanged at par for gold; and in no sense, either in law or morals or even good manners, is there any excuse for this often-repeated cry of "printed lies."

HOW TO RESUME.

That every one would be glad to see these notes equal in value to gold is certain. That they will be is certain. How to bring this about is the problem on which men honestly disagree, and which deserves not the sneers and gibes of either side, but a fair and candid comparison of opinion. The method of contraction will do it, no doubt. Will any other process? In my judgment the true way to enhance the value of our currency is to enlarge it in a moderate degree to meet the growing business of the country. The rate of interest is too high; a larger supply of currency will reduce this. The unequal system of national banking has deranged the proper condition of the country financially and needs adjustment. The system ought to be equalized or abolished. It is a good one, were its operations equitably distributed throughout the land. But unless this is done the whole system would work better if supplied by notes furnished directly by the Government, based on its credit, and payable in gold when resumption is possible. I believe that if we had to-day nothing but a legal-tender currency of $730,000,000 instead of $382,000,000, and $349,000,000 of bank-notes, we would be in better condition than we are. The banks, then, would require no reserves for circulation; they would only have to take care of their deposits; they could stand on an equal footing everywhere; there would be no assorting of currency, no discriminations, and the faith of the people in the ability of the Government to pay its debts would not be diminished one jot or tittle.

But this is mere matter of opinion, and perhaps should not be expressed in this discussion.

One small class of clamorous and half-mad people fill the air with denunciations of our paper circulation. They have the ear of the great sea-coast editors; they have the ring in the nose of the sea-coast politicians; they swarm about the halls of legislation; they connive together in the back parlors of banks; they are the importers, the men who deal in foreign goods, the men who must have gold to pay their debts with, the men who desire to bring all things to a gold standard. They would prostrate every interest to secure their ends; they deal upon the plane of the currency of the world, and we must expect them to clamor for every advantage; we must expect them to strike down all interests but their own; we must expect from them a policy half-foreign, unnational, and unpatriotic. We must expect them to forget, or overlook, or to be ignorant of the true interests of the vast majority of the people who dwell in the interior. But we do not expect reasonable men to be frightened by their denunciations or hoodwinked by their sophistry. The wonder is that their influence extends beyond the narrow circle of their half-foreign business, and that their Old-World policy is not more distasteful than it is to sensible Americans. Their policy is to destroy home industries and import all things possible.

GOLD IS AN ARTICLE OF TRADE, NOT CURRENCY.

There is one advantage that our present currency possesses that liberates us from the panics of the Old World; it is non-exportable. They cannot drain us as they formerly did in times of distress there. Our currency is fixed in volume, is confined to our national limits, and is therefore subject to none of the fluctuations which the financial management, the revolutions, the wars, the dearths, the failures, or the combinations of the Old World may occasion. I am not certain but that this very attribute of non-exportability is more than a compensation for all the inconveniences brought on by the margin between gold and paper money; for, as I said before, these inconveniences are confined mainly to a class, and that a small class. The vast mass of the people know and care nothing for the little margin between the gold of to-day and the gold of last week. Gold, like wheat or pork or iron, is an article of merchandise or traffic; is not a standard of value; is not in any sense a currency. The article is too scarce for any such purpose, and is not likely to increase in volume until we adopt some method of digging larger amounts from our mines. Gold is a practical, substantial, common-place material that can only be obtained by hard work, or by selling something for which it is paid. Legislation will not create it. Congressmen cannot dig it by enactments, nor bring it from foreign countries by any contrivance of law. To get gold we must procure it from our own mines, or receive it from other people's in exchange for our exports. At present the mines yield no surplus worth naming, and the balance of trade is against us, so that our store of gold cannot possibly increase. To contract the currency will not make one more gold dollar, not one. You may go on contracting a hundred millions and it will not put one more pick in the miner's hands, it will not enable us to export one more cent's worth of surplus. You may reduce the paper currency to on equal volume with that of gold (the Director of the Mint estimates it at $140,000,000) till both together amount to only $300,000,000, and all this will not produce one more gold dollar.

On the other hand, the effect will be to paralyze industry and cut down the surplus for export. The miners will cease to work, the farmers will grow slothful in their fields, the mechanics will abandon their shops, the whole land will languish, and the supply of gold grow less and less as your work of contraction goes on.

To show the amount of gold and silver produced, I submit the calculations of R. W. Raymond, United States commissioner of mining statistics:

Total assessed valuation	14,178,986,732

The total valuation, according to official returns, of the wealth of the country was—

1870	$30,068,518,507

This increase is over all that was destroyed in the rebellion, and the value of the slaves.

I very well remember that from the State of Connecticut there were annually shipped to our country boxes of their currency, of the notes of the Hartford County Bank, of the Hartford insurance companies, and of other New England banks, with the agreement that it was to be loaned out and kept in circulation so many days before it was returned. That was lent in small sums to our people, and we had to get along with that currency, distant from us and often discredited. And yet they talk of our people having had before the war the very best kind of currency. Sir, it was not a currency; it was a miserable humbug, and you cannot say that there was any true element of currency about it. It was miserable stuff, that would not travel beyond the borders of the State and keep for any time its face value.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman name any Hartford bank that ever failed to pay every dollar it owed?

Mr. COBURN. I am not talking about the failure of the Hartford banks; but I said that this miserable stuff was sent to our country, and that it had only a local reputation. For the lack of a sufficient currency of our own we were obliged to take it and keep it afloat so many days, often become depreciated, and then it went back to the regions where it belonged.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If every dollar was paid, why was it miserable stuff?

Mr. COBURN. I am talking now about this matter as the test of the amount of circulation which the country needed. The circulation I named was not redeemable there; it was liable to depreciation away from home; besides, our citizens could not go to Hartford and borrow the money, but the banker borrowed it, and agreed to put it in circulation and keep it afloat for a certain number of days, and as we needed circulation we had to take it, to borrow it second-hand from our bankers.

Mr. POTTER. Was not that as good as currency that is not redeemable at all?

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman does not understand what I am talking about. The very point that I make is that this was stuff which had no currency beyond the limits of the State. The trouble with it was that it was no test as to the amount of circulation which we needed.

Mr. POTTER. It was redeemable only in one State, the gentleman says. Even so, was it less valuable than United States notes which are not redeemable anywhere?

Mr. COBURN. It was not a legal tender anywhere, as United States notes are. But what I am talking about is that we are entitled to bank accommodations as well as bank circulation; not to mere bank-notes issued a thousand miles from us.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Why did you not establish State banks under State laws?

Mr. COBURN. We had banks there, a multitude of banks of every kind, giving us the circulation which I am now complaining of. We had a good State bank of limited capital; we also had in 1854, 1855, and 1856 more than $7,000,000 of free-bank circulation in Indiana; much of it miserable stuff that depreciated down to 5 per cent. of its face, and ranged from that up to par. We had the most tremendous inflation of such currency in Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Indiana, until the old saying was verified that you could take a market-basket full of such stuff to market and buy a bushel of potatoes paying for it bushel for bushel. We were suffering for the want of good currency such as we have now. We had a currency then that depreciated, while that which we now have depreciates in no man's hands. Some of it was based on bonds, and some of it was not; and tens of millions of dollars in the Western and Southern States were lost by it. We never will return to that system while we can get legal-tenders or national-bank notes that are always good everywhere.

The policy of gentlemen here seems to be to break down the legal-tenders, and get them out of the way, so that you will have no basis for banking except gold and silver. When you get that how much circulation will you have in the country? You may have perhaps $200,000,000, perhaps not that much. The policy that these gentlemen advocate sweeps away not only the legal-tenders, but the national-bank currency largely also; and we will then have to resort inevitably to the wretched system of local and State banks. These gentlemen say that they want to get back some day to specie payments, and those banks would be compelled to keep a little gold in their vaults and to have but little more paper in circulation than they have of gold. I hope that day may be far off if we have no greater supply of gold than we have now. It will be, in my judgment, a day of sorrow, of disaster, and bankruptcy.

We are in an abnormal condition. An immense drain is upon us constantly for over $100,000,000 a year to pay the interest on the public debt. How can you, in view of this, draw the line of distinction now as you did in former times, and say that the banks must pay gold for their issues? According to the calculations of the commissioner of mining statistics, we have in all in this country about $130,000,000 of gold; outside of the Treasury perhaps not more than $60,000,000. How are you going to redeem with that? The notes of the banks to be redeemed in gold would not have half the credit that the old Hartford County money had. They could not travel as far or be credited as long.

HOW TO GET GOLD.

The only way to arrive at a gold standard is by the prosperity of the country. Then the mines will be developed, the surplus will be large, exports will call for specie, and we can accumulate a store of gold ready for use as a currency. Nothing else will do it. We had as well attempt to legislate sunshine and showers as to legislate gold into the hands of our people. Give them room for improvement, an equal race, an American policy, home industry, a home market, protection for the laborer, good wages, plenty of work, and imperceptibly the growth of the country will carry us to specie payments. We will be able to pay off our national debt thus; the annual drain for interest will be less. This alone will put down the price of gold. This it is which now keeps it up. But for the sum required each year for interest gold would be on a level with paper. This is the secret of the margin. When the debt is removed, or in a great measure paid, the regular demand for it will be so small that the price will fall. This rule must apply as much to specie as to iron, or lead, or any other commodity. When the demand is small, the price falls. There is no more mystery about gold on this point than there is about pork or wheat or whisky or cotton.

In all of our legislation upon this subject one point should never be forgotten, and that is the constant demand for gold to pay the interest on our public debt. We are by reason of this thing in an abnormal condition. We are prone to forget this fact. Keeping it in view, it is easy to see that really the price of gold is for this reason above par, if I may be pardoned the expression. It is above the true standard of money value. It is not, and cannot be, considered as money. As the debt is paid, it will gradually lose its value as an article of prime necessity, and assume its natural condition in business. This, added to the development of our country, will in a few years restore our currency to an equality with specie. It is questionable whether anything else can do so.

After all the real payment of specie is a myth. Baron Rothschild, in the monetary convention held in France in 1870, said that England was not and never had been a specie-paying nation. In other words, whenever a panic came specie payment was suspended and some other remedy was resorted to. England could not pay specie to-day from her great bank in case of a continued run, nor could the Bank of France. In England the note circulation, over and above the coin reserves, is about $200,000,000. In France it exceeds the coin reserves over $400,000,000. A panic, a run upon either, must prostrate their credit at any time. We can never, while our debt is large and consequently our demand for interest heavy, think of paying specie even if the values of gold and paper approach and become identical. We would be constantly liable to runs for gold to meet the regular demand.

MODERATE EXPANSION NOT DANGEROUS

The question constantly recurs, how is this nation going to bring the legal-tender notes to par? If any one could answer this question satisfactorily he would be the master-genius of the hour. I can answer it, and I think no one will say the plan will not succeed. It is this: Contract the paper currency until it approaches the quantity of gold in the country. That will be sure to bring about specie payment. Now the trouble is this is not a satisfactory answer. So I get no credit for genius. I think all will admit that it is a sure way to bring the result.

If this is done all will admit that such radical and enormous contraction would be ruinous, would prostrate business, and bankrupt good men everywhere. The policy of contraction, then, to a degree that will be effectual, is nobody's policy.

Then why contract at all? Why pinch yourself, diet yourself, and prepare to take the medicine if it kills you to take it in the end? Why meddle with it at all? Why adopt a remedy that never can be used, and praise a nostrum when you know it is certain death to take it? That is this quack physic called contraction.

But, say some, take it in broken doses. Why do so, when every time we try it it makes us worse? We tried it in 1866, and could not stand the remedy. We tried it again from 1870 to 1873, and almost perished. Both these periods of contraction brought on disasters, directly traceable to a scarcity of currency.

How, then, can we bring these legal-tenders to par? How does a man who has a large real estate, who has good health, energy, and business capacity, but is in debt, bring up his credit? Certainly not by quitting business, certainly not by taking his working capital and paying off a small part of his debts. On the other hand he continues business; he puts forth all of his energies; he takes advantage of the rise in property, of the prosperity of his neighbors, of the growth of the country. With good management, with active exertion, with determined purpose, with strict economy, and by the help of time he is sure to succeed. This is seen every day in real life. Great debts are thus paid; great fortunes are thus made. The leaders of the financial world do this very thing.

This plan will bring specie payment by the mere growth and development of the country; the debt at last will be a mere bagatelle as compared with our ability to pay and will then soon be disposed of.

Another plan is to continue to pay off the debt regularly and gradually. This increases our present burdens, checks our growth, embarrasses our business, and prolongs the ultimate extinguishment of the debt. But this plan will bring us to specie payment at no very distant day; the margin between paper money and coin being kept up by the constant demand of a large sum of coin to pay the interest on the public debt. When the interest ceases, the demand ceases almost entirely. Both of the latter plans can be accomplished without contraction; both, I think, can be aided by a reasonable expansion.

What shall we do? Contract and bring on bankruptcy? Stand still and struggle under self-imposed restraints? Or expand and grow beyond the limits of our debts and liabilities so far that their yoke shall be easy and their burden light?

But it is said that the method of expansion is the sure way to ruin. That we have already too much currency, and ought not to have any more. This is mere declamation. We have had a very much larger currency than we have now, and under adverse circumstances we prospered and paid our debts. In the period just after the war, in 1865 and 1866, our currency ranged as follows:

National-bank notes outstanding	$171,321,903
Legal-tender and other notes	698,918,800
State-bank notes, (estimated)	58,000,000
Total	928,240,703
Seven-thirties of 1864 and 1865	830,000,000

National-bank notes	280,253,818
State-bank notes	9,748,025
Legal-tender and other notes	608,870,825
Total	898,872,668
Seven-thirties	830,000,000
Total	1,728,872,668

Since which time contraction has gone on until the whole amount of currency of every kind now outstanding is $742,000,000.

National-bank notes	$339,081,799
State-bank notes	1,188,853
Legal-tender and other notes	401,527,267
Total	741,797,919
Seven-thirties outstanding	274,100
Total	767,072,019
Add twenty-five millions of reserve issued	25,000,000
Total	767,072,019
Amount of currency in 1865	928,240,703
Amount of currency in 1873	767,072,919
Amount of contraction	181,778,784
Add the seven-thirties	829,725,000
Total contraction	1,018,167,784

The expansion of 1865 and 1866 did not ruin us, but enabled the nation to pay enormous debts and taxes, and come out of the war without bankruptcy.

But another equally significant fact is made manifest, and that is that by reason of this enormous contraction which occurred almost entirely between May, 1865, the close of the war, and May, 1869, the value of gold did not increase. Gold was at 128 in May, 1865, at 125 in April, 1866, and at 144 in May, 1869. This is enough to show that any amount of contraction, until the quantity of paper is reduced almost to that of gold, will fail to be effectual to restore them to equality. I insert the table showing these facts:

There has been a most remarkable expansion or inflation of business in Europe and this country within the last nineteen years. The New York Bulletin of a recent date published the statistics, compiled from official sources, showing the growth from 1855 to 1872, a period of seventeen years. These data prove that the whole commerce of the principal European and North American nations has increased from $4,241,700,000 to $9,276,000,000, being on increase of 118 per cent., while population in the same countries has for that period gone up from 271,443,000 to 311,620,000, a gain of 40,177,000, or about 14 per cent. These great commercial nations have doubled their exports. This surplus is not the only evidence of their prosperity. Ten thousand improvements have been made everywhere in buildings, roads, bridges, factories, mills, machinery, cities, boats, and railroads. It is estimated that the increase in railroad property is $10,000,000,000 alone.

This marvelous growth has no parallel in history, and is to every reflecting mind an ample warrant for the increase of currency. The average common-sense man believes that an increase of wealth and business in a country requires an increase in the currency. The man of Wall street cannot see it in that light, the importer cannot see it, the man who has money to lend cannot see it very plainly; but the man who embarks in business does, the merchant, the manufacturer, the laborer, the farmer, the middle-man, does. All these men see and feel the importance of keeping currency on a pace with business. To them the rate of interest is a consideration of importance; so is the possibility of making loans. These men in our country and in every civilized country do business largely upon the credit system, and they look anxiously to the question of accommodations in bank to bridge over occasional gaps in their supply of funds.

The world does move and change, but those who quote Webster and the old statesmen who died before these astounding steps of progress do the grossest injustice in their attempts to apply their mere arguments as to the policy of their times to ours. The Webster of to-day would not be found among the pinching and grinding contractionists; his grand soul would have risen to the height of the great argument for progressive financial management. He would have seen and appreciated the grand march of events, and lent his own powerful eloquence to plead the cause of true national advancement. He spoke for no day and no occasion like the present. He was laid in his honored grave before the great events I have named had their inception.

A PLEDGE TO CONTRACT BUT TO RESUME.

But gentlemen say we are pledged to the policy of contraction by national conventions and by the law. There never was a greater mistake. These resolutions looked to a resumption of specie payments. But not necessarily by the road of contraction. There may be other methods than that; better, wiser, safer, more speedy. I think the shortest one is by moderate expansion. I am not so uncharitable as to call those who differ with me either fools or repudiators. They may be both; but for the purposes of the argument I will call them neither. Nor will I make any threats that I will fight them forever and never vote for them hereafter. They may be as honest as I am, they may be as sensible. I think they fail to comprehend the situation, and would be glad to see them enlightened.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. As the gentleman seems to refer to me, will he allow me to ask him a question? If those who differ with him, according to his sincere belief, no matter how honest they are——

Mr. COBURN. Please ask the question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If they are advocating measures which in his conscience the gentleman believes to be hostile to the good faith and honor of his country, would he not feel bound to fight them, and would he not do it? I say to him that if I am so far wrong as he seems to think me to be, I beg him to fight me, as I certainly shall him.

Mr. COBURN. I do not expect to scare anybody by any threats I may make on this floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. COBURN. We are reasoning here, not fighting.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It will be a good-natured fight, but a fight to the end.

Mr. COBURN. These pledges are as wide as the world from contraction; they are silent upon the method of securing resumption, and gentlemen, when they lift the lash and utter their threats, had better pause before they strike. They may hit men whose sense of honor is as keen as they proclaim their own to be; they may hit men who can outstrip them in the road to resumption; they may hit men who do not set themselves up as the champions of political sanctity, and walk into the House with an air of self-righteousness, delivering long lectures on political decency. I doubt not the members who favor an expansion of the currency are as honest, are as faithful to their promises, are as true politically, as they who virtually proclaim them repudiators. They desire to have gold the standard and a part of the circulating medium. They will find very few to differ with them about that. How to get to that point is the difficulty upon which they give us no light. To prove that he is right in his opinion, the gentleman from Connecticut reads the opinion of the rich men of Boston, New York, Hartford, and other cities, who own national-bank stock. Now, if expansion is disastrous and these men believe it to be so, why do they not retire their own circulation? While they themselves keep millions of this irredeemable stuff afloat and protest against anybody else putting any more afloat their word is not worth much. They become objects of contempt and ridicule—are guilty of hypocrisy and shameless assumption. When they retire the millions they hold in circulation let them speak; not till then.

The men of Boston who have twenty-six and a half millions of this circulation; the men of Connecticut who have eighteen millions of this circulation; the men of Rhode Island who have thirteen millions of this circulation; the men of New York City who have twenty-seven and three-quarter millions of this circulation; the men of Philadelphia who have twelve millions of this circulation—these are the men who loudly protest against the present redundant currency, who denounce those who want to increase it, and yet hold on with the grip of death to every dollar they can get, and have the sublime effrontery to send petitions to Congress to prevent people who have not one dollar where they have ten from obtaining a cent. Let such hypocrites cry war, let such financial charlatans cry repudiation, let such Shylocks lecture on political morals.

They want gold. Why do not they set the example, and retire their paper and do their business on as little paper as possible? Does any one force the shin-plaster national banks upon them? Are they compelled to submit to this infliction? Are they tied hand and foot by some tyrant, and forced to support these odious banks in their midst? One would think from the horror with which their Representatives talk about inflated bank paper that it was an object of dread or detestation to them. No, sir; they roll it all as a sweet morsel under their tongues, and denounce every other man who desires a taste.

And yet these very men, not six months ago, pale, shivering, and demoralized by the panic, with frantic haste clamored for the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the forty-four million reserve. They have gathered together their little piles now, and after a disgraceful suspension and repudiation of their contracts with their own friends and depositors come here and lecture honest men who never broke faith with mortal man as repudiators. Let such pretenders be silent till the echoes of their clamors for expansion have died out, till the ink is dry upon the ledgers which record their own repudiation and their own shame, while they locked up the all of the man of wealth and of the humblest poor alike in their coffers, and stopped by their cowardice the wheels of industry and the flying feet of trade. Let these bankers of the East be still for a season, and not insult the representatives of the people by their shameful clamor.

The argument of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] is good for nothing if it does not prove that the use of legal-tender currency destroys the real progress of a people and creates an artificial and hollow prosperity which must vanish. He attempts to show that it is adverse to the interests of the laborer first, and then of all legitimate business men. I quote from his remarks to show his position, which is the position of those who oppose expansion, as fairly stated as itcan be:

> The promises issued by the consumer, whether it be the Government or the laborer, are not from their nature currency, and any effort to force their circulation produces only confusion and loss. But this is what our Government did when, in the stress of war, it issued its promises against property which it consumed or destroyed. Hence came the greenback; fruitful source of all our woes. This increased the currency beyond its natural limits. It was in excess.
> There was more currency than there was property for it to represent, and

THERE WAS A DEPRECIATION.

> Let me not waste time to chronicle the now familiar effects of a depreciated and irredeemable currency. It is always in excess. This excess stimulates extravagance and speculation. There is constant temptation to be rid of a currency whose value is uncertain. Use it now, it is worth something; retain it until to-morrow, it may be worth nothing. And so the spirit of the gambler enters into the heart of the nation, and after extravagance comes speculation, crime, moral and material ruin. To chronicle what of this moral and material ruin is general, I do not pause. I pass this to show that the worst evils of an unsound currency fall upon the poor. The harm of wrong legislation in finance, as in taxation, falls and rests at last upon them. As a direct consequence of depreciated money, prices fluctuate, so the man who buys cannot tell for what he will sell, or what his money will be worth when he gets his pay. Against this uncertainty the rich man who sells can insure himself by adding a percentage to his price. The poor man who buys, buys to consume not to sell again, and pays this percentage out of his poverty. The rich man adds to the price of his commodities the premium on gold at each rise, and by continual exchanges adjusts or shifts the loss. The poor man has but one thing to exchange—his labor—and does not know the hourly, daily, or weekly rise of gold; and does he, he cannot daily, hourly, weekly, or even monthly, add it to his wages. He cannot readily make new contracts for his labor, and, unfortunately, it is the only contract he can ever make. So the premium on gold reaches his wages last of all.
> Certainly, then, an

IRREDEEMABLE CURRENCY IS NOT FOR THE POOR MAN.

> If it is for the benefit of any, it is for the rich man and for the speculator. The more rich the man, the more desperate the speculator, the more easily he avoids the losses; the more certainly he profits by the fluctuations. Increase the number and variety of transactions, and you increase the opportunities to adjust or shift the burdens of a fluctuating currency. The poor man, who has nothing to sell but his labor, and who has everything to buy—lodging, food, clothing—finds his labor receiving only the premium on gold. This is bad for him at one end, and it is equally bad at the other; for, for his support, he pays, in each case, something beyond the premium. And this brings us to the general principle, that the premium on gold does not accurately measure the advance of prices, except in those articles that we export. In all other articles, prices rise beyond the gold premium, and this rise is due to the percentage added on each exchange to insure the seller against subsequent depreciation of the money in which he shall be paid.

LEGAL-TENDERS THE LIFE OF THE NATION.

In the first place this declaration is unpatriotic. The greenback saved the nation; it was one of the essential links in the chain of forces that held us together; just as important in its place as the Army or the Navy. In the next place it has no foundation in truth and fact. The banks early in the war failed to pay specie, could not do it, and could not supply the country with currency. The greenbacks became the currency, together with other United States notes and obligations. It was a question of life or death to business. That is the wellknown fact, and answers all he says. The greenback grew out of the necessities of the war, and was the staff of life at that time. It is idle to say that it begot speculations. If the Government could have got gold it would have done so; but it was not to be had, nor was bank paper. It was compelled to issue its own notes. He says the issue of greenbacks increased the currency beyond its natural limits. What were its natural limits but the necessities of the times?

In the next place the mistake is that the greenback begat or begets speculation. No paper circulation below par in specie was ever so steady, had ever so few fluctuations, was ever so reliable. No State banks, no free banks, no company banks, no private banks, as a rule, had so fully the qualities of steadiness, reliability, and held public confidence so well. The gentleman is young, but possibly his recollection runs back beyond the war, when we had all sorts of local banks whose credit reached rarely beyond a State and often not beyond a county or neighborhood. This was the sound currency he wants and praises; this is the stuff that his dreams are made of. This paper was begotten by the natural laws which he defines for creating bank-notes. He desires, if his desires are founded on his arguments, to go back to the old days of individual banks, set up like stores wherever men need money, and brought out by the natural laws of business, as he expresses it. The country has long been sick of that kind of local financial management. It is ante-diluvian; it is buried beneath the mud of a revolution in business that sunk these little contemptible local banks where the eyes of men of sound views will never reach them. We must have a national currency forever hereafter, based in part on the public credit and controlled by its regulations; such a currency as all recognize and respect. Not the puny little bank-notes the gentleman so much admires, which have neither credit nor respectability beyond a narrow limit, and many not even there. We will have no return forever to the fluctuations, the depreciation, the bankruptcy, the worthlessness, the speculations, the poverty, the woe begotten by these local banks. Untold tens of millions will not account for all the losses heaped upon society by these worthless banks. Banks that were established in the days of specie payment, banks that rested on gold, banks that, like all other banks that do pay specie, never pay it when it is most needed.

LEGAL-TENDERS THE POOR MAN'S CURRENCY.

But the gentleman says that "irredeemable currency is not for the poor man; if it is for the benefit of any it is for the rich man, for the speculator." Is this true? How are wages now as compared with wages before we had this currency? I quote from the report of the Hon. Edward Young, on the cost of labor and subsistence. On an average blacksmiths get 45 per cent. more now, bricklayers and masons 48 per cent., cabinet-makers 41 per cent., coopers 42 per cent., carpenters 53 per cent., painters 45 per cent., plasterers 50 per cent., shoemakers 40 per cent., stone-cutters 43 per cent., tailors 37 per cent., tanners 45 per cent., tinsmiths 41 per cent., wheelwrights 43 per cent.; total average increase 45 per cent. The rate of increase of wages of farm laborers is 49 per cent. without board, and the percentage of increase with board is 48 per cent., showing conclusively that the cost of living in that respect has increased for such men but 1 per cent., while the price of labor has increased 49 per cent.

CONTRAST OF AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN WAGES.

This attempt to bring everything to a gold standard, if successful, will be the death-blow to the mechanics and others who work for wages. The inevitable effect is to place the price of work about on an average with that of the gold-using civilized nations of Europe. We must, if our currency flows in a common channel, settle down to a level with them in prices. This is as necessary a result as that the waters of lakes draining into each other will constantly settle down to the lower levels and at last find a common level in the ocean. The wages of the civilized specie-paying nations of Europe vary somewhat, owing to local causes; but in the main there is but a small percentage of difference as compared with those of this country. The American blacksmith gets at a gold standard $16.40 a week. The English blacksmith gets $7, the Irish blacksmith $8, the German blacksmith $6, the French blacksmith $5.34 a week, the Austrian $7.20. These are the average highest wages, and in Europe all the trades are classified with three, four, or five grades of wages. American masons get on an average $21.33 a week, while the English gets $9.04, the German $8.37, the French $6.60, the Austrian and Swiss $6 a week. American plasterers get $21.33 a week. English $9.04, Irish $8.71, German $8.64, French $8.40, Swiss $7.20. American carpenters get $16 a week, English $9.04, Irish $8.90, German $9.25, Prussian $10, French $12, Russian $9.60, Austrian $7.20. American painters get $15.11 a week, English $8.71, Irish $9.44, Prussian $10, French, Italian, and Swiss, each $6. American machinists get $18.66 a week, English $9.60, German and French $6, Prussian $10.80, Swiss $9. American cabinetmakers get $17.33 a week, English $8.22 a week, Irish $7.26 a week, German $5.04 a week, Prussian $10.80 a week, French and Swiss $6, Russian $7.80. American tailors get $31.11; English get $9.20, Scotch $6.78, German $7.92, Prussian $6.48, French $7.20, Swiss $6, Russian $9. American heaters in iron-works get $21.33 a week; English get $12.10, German get $4.32. American puddlers get $24 dollars a week; English get $10.89 a week, German $8.74, Prussian $9.36. American printers, compositors on daily papers, get $33.78 a week, English $9.68, Scotch $13.31. American curriers get $16 a week; English get $9.13. American tanners get $11.33 a week; English get $7.68, German $5.04, Prussian $5.76, Austrian $7.20, French $8. American woolspinners get $12 a week, English $7.75, German $7.20, Prussian $4.32, Austrian $4. The American day-laborer in building gets $12.44 a week, the English $5.93, the German $3.04, the Irish $4.36, the French $2.52, the Prussian and Dane $3.60.

The above rates are for first-class workmen in either country, and the statistics are taken from the report of the bureau of statistics and labor, for 1874, of Massachusetts—probably the very best authority on the subject. These data show that the American mechanic gets in many instances double, and in others an increase of from 75 to 90 per cent. of wages over his European brother in the same branch of employment. The facts thus furnished cover forty different trades which, themselves, are in many instances divided into many classes and grades.

WE CANNOT LIVE ON THE EUROPEAN PLAN.

We are not prepared to bring our nation to these gold-price standards. We live on a different plane. We propose to make every man independent, and to do so as a reward of his industry. We must support schools and charities; we must improve our highways in the country, and the streets and public grounds of our cities. We cannot wait three or four hundred years to do it. We must raise great sums by taxation to carry on these public works and enterprises. We cannot do it if wages and prices go down to what they are in the Old World. The surplus will be too small. With a currency of our own non-exportable, and yet sound, we have made and are making this progress successfully. If our people were reduced to the low rates of Europe we could never pay our private debts, provide public funds, pay our public debts, or make anything but slow progress. The dull and sluggish nations of Asia who do labor, such as the hundreds of millions of Hindoos and Chinese, are fair samples of low wages and low prices of food and clothing. They have a gold standard and little or none of the facilities of banks and the credit system.

AMERICAN WAGES, PRICES, AND CREDIT.

The vast frame-work of our society is imbedded in a system of high prices, high wages, and commercial credit, and cannot be withdrawn from it unless by an utter anhiliation of all of our prosperity. To divorce our people from them would prostrate all business, all values, all progress, and leave them hopeless and helpless bankrupts, ready for revolution, for plunder, for self-destruction, for despotism and barbarism.

This is the feast the contractionist and the specie-payer invite us to sit down to. Their policy is working well in Hindostan and China, has too much supremacy in Central and Southern Europe, and partial sway in Northern Europe. This country, largely divorced from it, is an instance of what a people may do that is lifted above the fluctuations of the business of hundreds of millions beyond their borders, who have no common interest with them. We stand alone, high above and far out beyond them all in the great ways of progress, and we do so in a great measure because our currency is not regulated by the condition of the currency of the world. We do so because wages, prices, labor, food, clothing, building; in a word the rewards of industry, are twofold here what they are elsewhere. This it is that gives nerve, vitality, energy, perseverance, boldness, grasp, to the human will and intellect, and carries men over all obstacles to progress. How enormous this advantage is becomes apparent at once when we look at the difference between the raw material and the finished article, between the ore and the polished tool, between the sand and the speaking mirror, between the tree and the elegant cabinet, between the fleece and the glossy cloth. It is almost all labor. In some cases nine-tenths of the difference is labor, in some ninety-nine hundredths. The raw material and the laborer stand face to face; with high wages he, first of all, gets the benefit; the price of the article is higher, but the laborer gets it; nobody else can, nobody else does. This makes the difference between the comfortable mechanic living in his own house here and his poverty-smitten brother beyond the ocean. Make our currency equal to gold by making it scarce and you inevitably put the rate of wages where theirs belongs. Put down wages, dry up the very fountains of prosperity, and all prices must fall; provisions, merchandise, stocks, and real estate, all will sink together. They cannot remain as valuable as they were when the million little demands of the humble laborer are cut off. As well expect to have rivers without showers or snows; as well expect to have an abundant harvest without ten million nodding heads of wheat; as well expect great casks of glowing and fragrant wine without the myriad clusters of purple grapes, nestling on many a sunny hillside, as to expect a nation to be great, powerful, prosperous, and happy, without millions of comfortable homes, made so by the abundant rewards of honest toil.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. COBURN. But it is said the cost of living has increased under the present currency in proportion to price of wages. It is admitted all around, more than that, made the basis of argument, that the prices of all the great staple articles of consumption are regulated by the prices in Liverpool and London, without regard to our currency, so those articles are disposed of. The opponents of expansion put them at once out of the question. Next as to clothing, the great staple articles of cotton and woolen goods are, on an average, as cheap now as before the war. The labor in making up these goods into wearing apparel has principally enhanced their value.

THE FARMERS PROFIT BY OUR SYSTEM.

But it is said that the farmer at last derives no profit from the expansion of the currency; that all that he raises is valued at Mark Lane, in London, and at gold rates. This is a very great mistake. In the first place, the great majority of farmers cultivate but small tracts of land, have but a small surplus, and derive but a portion of their livings from the amount obtained from the sale of exportable articles. Their living, in a great measure, comes from the soil and is not bought or sold. In the next place, they produce a large amount of non-exportable articles, such as horses, mules, work-cattle, hay, oats, potatoes, turnips, and other vegetables, besides fruits, poultry, and many articles consumed daily in immense quantities in every community. The prices of these are all fixed at home and have no relation to commerce. They constitute a large part of the surplus of farmers.

The secret of a home market seems to have been overlooked by the gentleman; a home market which puts the laborer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, the middle-man, side by side with the farmer. This home market, in the shape of towns and cities, is growing rapidly, and has grown more rapidly than ever, before under the influence of this contemptible irredeemable paper, so much despised by some gentlemen. The increase in manufactures in the West since we have adopted this hated currency has had no parallel in our history. In fact, but a small part of our farm products find a foreign market.

Nothing better illustrates this than the size of the farms. The fact is that more than four-fifths of all the farmers of the United States own and live upon farms of less than one hundred acres. Their families obtain a subsistence on these small farms and but a small surplus is produced. Almost half of the farmers in the country live on farms of less than fifty acres. Now, only a portion of this land is cleared, so that at once it will be seen that the great thing done by these farmers is not to produce articles for foreign export but for home consumption.

I present to the House a statement prepared from the census tables of 1871, showing the whole number of farmers and the number living on farms of less than fifty acres, and the number on farms of less than one hundred acres. It confirms what I have said:

What the farmer wants to know in matters of trade is, whether he will have ready sale at a fair price for his produce and live stock. If business is prosperous he can dispose of his horses and mules, his marketing, his hay, grain, and hogs. If it is dull, he cannot. He knows that when bank accommodations are scarce, when the rate of interest is very high, when currency cannot be had for any interest, he must suffer, no difference what the price in London may be. He knows very well that a high price in London is worth nothing to him unless the traders in such staples as grain, pork, whisky, flour, and cheese can get bank accommodations. He knows that business is largely done on credit and by the aid of the banks, and that the dealers in these articles anticipate the market as far as they can by this means. This is the course of business which he cannot help or change.

In my country last fall men who made contracts for hogs could not comply with them, and hundreds and thousands of contracts were violated because there was not currency enough in the country to meet the demands. It was not a question of the wealth of individuals or of the price of the article, but a simple question whether or not the currency could be raised to meet the contract. The result was a panic in hogs. The farmer lost largely; the prices went down and they sold. Since then the price has gone up, and the speculator has made the profit.

When the crops are to be moved, if currency is scarce, the price goes down, the market is glutted, the surplus goes off slowly. If the price in London were high, the effect would be the same. It is not a question of the quality now, but of the quantity. The quality he is satisfied with, and so is almost everybody else but the importers. The farmer never complains at the fair market price, but he does complain justly and loudly when his way to the market is obstructed and he is shut off and shaved simply for the lack of current money.

So he reasons that it would be wise to have a greater supply. If there are not cars enough to carry off his produce, he is shut off in the same way, and naturally says let us have more cars. Currency is the carrier of business; it is like the cars—more are needed as business increases. The number of dealers, the amount dealt in, the frequency of business transactions, all add to the demands for currency. Business in agricultural regions is not and cannot be done by clearing-houses upon a 5 per cent. supply as in New York, or on a 3 per cent. supply as in London. Pockets and pocket-books are yet in vogue, especially in the rural districts. People since the currency suspension last fall are getting a little shy of the banks. They will hold on to a little personally. If the currency were gold, the people would treat the subject in the same way if the banks were located and restricted as they are now. They see this inequality and insist that there shall be more banks, more accommodations, more clearing-houses, more commercial paper as well as more currency. And they reason in this simple way: that if there is more currency all these other things will be added unto it. Are they wrong? Are they barking up the wrong tree, as the hunters say? It is not impossible to organize more banks, and they think that will increase banking facilities. An extension of these privileges will give an extension of all the currency attending banks. They desire a reasonable increase of currency and bank facilities. They are not mad inflationists, unreasoning levelers, hot-headed experimenters. It may be well to see what inflation is; what expansion is; what increase is. They are not convertible terms.

To add largely to that which has its natural size may be called inflation; to add in a moderate degree to such an object is expansion; to add to that which has not arrived at its full volume or extent is an increase. If our currency is up to its full extent, any considerable addition will be inflation; a small addition would be expansion; but if it is not at present in sufficient volume, then a large addition is neither inflation nor expansion.

DO WE WANT INCREASE OR INFLATION?

This question is argued as if it was a measure of expansion, of inflation, of undue enlargement. That depends upon another thing, and that is, whether the currency is already out in sufficient quantities. In other words, is exactly the right amount issued? If so, how was this found out? Who estimated that just this amount was the right one? How did we arrive at it? Was it the result of calculation or accident? Once, and that not long ago, we had a much larger paper circulation than we have now—more than double the quantity. We have been retiring in one form and issuing in another; and the whole matter is the merest experiment, founded upon no definite plan or reason as to amount.

We have literally drifted by accident, by merest chance, to the present amount. Now, but one thing is certain, we have in circulation about three hundred and eighty-two millions of legal-tender notes, and about three hundred and fifty millions of bank-notes. If this was just the amount we needed, an increase would be inflation. If the cup is full, to pour in will cause an overflow; if a sack is full a little pressure will expand it and make it inconveniently hold more or burst. Is the vessel full? Is the sack full? If the vessel is not, you can safely pour in more; if the sack is wrinkled and empty you can risk filling it also. How much currency the nation needs before the amount becomes superfluous no opponent of this measure has shown. If we find the vessel dry, if we find the sack empty, the most of us would say that it would be safe to replenish. Nobody would dread an overflow or a bursting. Last fall we found the vessel empty. Where the contents had gone no one could tell. The nation was athirst for currency, and not a drop to cool the parching tongue. Inflation was impossible then. The result was a collapse, distress, bankruptcy, poverty, ruin to very many good men in regular business. A general derangement has taken place. A general dissatisfaction prevails. A general apprehension exists, and yet men say, "Let us do nothing; let us stand still; let us diminish the supply." Is this reasonable? Is this the way men act in other emergencies? The evil seemed to be in scarcity. Shall we intensify it? We have waited too long already. Prompt action was our plain duty if possible. I can see no safety in contraction, none in standing still. We ought to provide against a recurrence of the evils of last fall, in so far as we can promptly.

We need a more elastic currency, one that may adapt itself to the demands of the country. I prefer a reserve of United States notes in the Treasury. This saves for all the money used in an emergency 5 or 6 per cent. The loan is secured and is made expressly temporary. The other plan, to deposit notes in the Treasury first and draw out bonds, is more expensive than the one just named. It, instead of saving, costs 5 or 6 per cent., just as the bonds rate, for the bonds must first come out before the reserve is created. This reserve will then cost at least 10 or 12 per cent., according to the bonds, more than the other plan; one saves interest to the Government, the other loses it.

The plan of the convertible bonds at an interest of 3.65 per cent. is similar to this, and loses 8.65 or 9.65 per cent. more than the one I suggest. The plan first named costs nothing, and saves the interest on the bonds deposited. It is a simple provision, and can work no harm. This reserve will be drawn upon but rarely, and for a short time.

In the bill before the House the principle of free banking gives elasticity. The provision as to the reserves may endanger the value of the bills. I would not dispense with it entirely, but reduce the proportion one-half.

The section as to the issue of gold notes is a measure of contraction, and will undo all we have recently done to authorize the issue up to $400,000,000. These notes will be hoarded and the legal-tenders retired, a sure way to contract the currency. As the legal-tenders are contracted, the bank-notes must ultimately follow. We cannot redeem in gold, and it is unsafe to fix a day of redemption, as this section proposes to do.

We do not need another kind of currency in addition to the legal-tenders and bank bills. Gold notes are more valuable than ordinary paper; they will not be a part of the circulation; they will be hoarded just as gold is, and they, taking the place of greenbacks, the effect will be the same as if we destroyed them and put gold dollars in their place; in other words, gold dollars and gold notes can never form a part of the currency till specie payment is reached. The note that calls for gold is as good as gold.

The gold note—what is it? Is it a greenback legal tender? One would think these terms were identical, while we listen to hours and days of argument that the greenback legal tender is a "printed lie," is a "broken promise to pay gold." Perhaps it is. But then this eighth section sounds singularly if that is so. The provision of the law of 1870 in relation to national banking which authorizes gold notes has a very strange sound if the legal-tender note promises gold. Legislators have a singular way of putting things, if these provisions are identical in style and meaning.

The fact in legislation is that gold notes are one thing and legal-tenders another. Business men understand this, and politicians who expect to be regarded as candid men ought to acknowledge it.

What, then, shall we do? Certainly make no promises to pay out the pittance of gold we now have and impoverish the scanty store we are compelled to hold to meet emergencies. Fix the legal-tender circulation at $400,000,000 for a permanent issue, with $50,000,000 additional for a reserve of United States notes. To this add a provision for free national banking on the present basis up to the present sum per capita allowed to the State of New York. This will give more privileges to the States not in excess than they will need for some years to come. If they do not take this circulation within a given time I would allow any citizen to do so. This, I believe, will give such relief in the direction of currency as the people need. And this will not postpone for a day the return of the time when there will be no question made as to the difference between specie and paper.

The bill of the Senate is on our table, having just passed. It is not all we want. It lacks the important feature of a reserve, but it is, as far as it goes, a measure of relief.

It is a practical question as to what to do. My advice will be to adopt this measure without amendment, as the best that can be done at present. The growth of business and the effect upon the country will no doubt serve as valuable guides to future financial management.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. With the consent of my colleague, I desire to give notice of an amendment which I shall offer whenever I may have an opportunity.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I also have an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are these amendments to be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it to be the desire that the several amendments which members may send to the desk to-day may appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. These are amendments, as I understand, which gentlemen indicate they would offer if they had an opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Of course the amendments cannot in the present stage attach to the bill. They are only an indication of what gentlemen desire to offer whenever they may have a parliamentary right to do so. These several amendments will be published in the RECORD.

[The amendments sent to the desk by members under the foregoing arrangement are as follows:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Amend section 5 by inserting after the words "carried on," in the fifth line, the following:

Provided, however, That said associations may invest their reserve in a 3.65 per cent. interest-bearing currency bond, which the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue; said bonds are to be convertible into currency at the pleasure of said associations: And provided further, That associations organized under the law or the law to which this is supplementary shall be, and are hereby, prohibited from paying interest to each other or receiving interest from each other upon deposits.

By Mr. BIERY:

Amend by striking out sections 7 and 8, as follows:

SEC. 7. That associations without circulation may be organized under the provisions of the said act, upon the deposit, with the Treasurer of the United States, of not less than $10,000 of United States registered bonds, as provided in section 16 of said act; and associations already organized without circulation are authorized to withdraw their bonds in excess of $10,000.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the beginning of each and every month from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange, and as a substitute, for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt, and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

By Mr. CORWIN:

Strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert:

That so much of the twenty-second section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof; and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and so much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of said act shall be free to establish and organize national banks, with circulation, at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions and subject to all the limitations and restrictions now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

By Mr. FARWELL:

Strike out the eighth section and insert the following:

That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually, and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. as therein prescribed shall be applied solely to the non-interest-bearing debt of the United States known as United States notes, which said notes, when purchased, shall be canceled and forever retired from circulation. The first application of said 1 per cent. to the purposes aforesaid shall be made after the 1st day of July, 1874, and within that fiscal year.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia:

Add to the bill the following as new sections:

SEC. —. That the act entitled "An act to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 26, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that any national banking association, State bank or banker, or association may pay out the notes of any State bank, town, city, or municipal corporation without paying any internal tax thereon.

SEC. —. That the entire amount of circulating notes authorized by this act, and by the acts which this act amends, shall be apportioned to associations in those States and Territories which have not their proportion of such bank circulation, until said States and Territories are made equal with the rest of the States; and to ascertain such equality, said apportionment shall be on the basis of representative population.

By Mr. HOLMAN:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations requiring the several national banking associations and their redeeming agencies to forward to the Treasury of the United States for cancellation all worn and mutilated bank-notes; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the same to be canceled and destroyed. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be canceled and destroyed all such notes of the national banking associations as may come into the Treasury; and he shall, from time to time, in lieu of such notes so canceled, issue United States notes of like denominations with the notes so canceled, which United States notes shall be of like tenor and effect, and in like manner lawful money and legal tender with the United States notes now authorized by law; and such United States notes shall be covered into the Treasury and applied, with other moneys in the Treasury, toward the liquidation of the national debt.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time to deliver to each of said national banking associations an amount of the bonds deposited in the Treasury to secure the circulation of such banking association equal to the par value of the notes canceled and destroyed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That no interest shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, after the passage of this act, on the bonds which have been or shall be deposited in the Treasury to secure the circulation of any banking association, except on the excess of the par value of such bonds over the average circulation of such association during the current year, while such bonds shall remain on deposit in the Treasury to secure such circulation.

By Mr. LAMISON:

That whenever it shall appear, at the end of any quarter in any fiscal year, that the net receipts from customs exceed the amount necessary for the payment of the interest of the public debt of the United States, it shall forthwith be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to so reduce the rate of duties on imports as that no more shall be collected from customs than shall be necessary for such purpose; and that such reduction shall be made pro rata upon the schedule of duties required to be paid by existing law at such date.

By Mr. MITCHELL:

Add to section 2 the following:

Provided, That in case any increase of national-bank note circulation beyond the present authorized limit of $354,000,000 shall take place, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel legal-tender notes to the extent of such increase until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes shall be reduced to $300,000,000; and for this purpose he is authorized to use any existing surplus revenue, or, in default of any such surplus, to sell 5 per cent. bonds of the Government.

By Mr. E. H. ROBERTS:

Add as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, commencing with the 1st of July, 1874, with the coin set apart as a sinking fund, according to the provisions of section 5 of the act of February 25, 1862, purchase, in the open market, legal-tender notes on the first Wednesday of every month, except September, October, and November, to such amount that the aggregate purchases for the year shall be equal to 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States. And the Secretary shall continue such purchases until the legal-tender notes remaining in circulation shall be and remain at par with gold when said purchases shall cease. And whenever said legal-tender notes shall again fall below par in gold such purchases shall be resumed and continued until the legal-tender notes remaining in circulation shall be and remain at par with gold, when said purchases shall cease. And whenever legal-tender notes shall have been so purchased, such legal-tenders shall be canceled and destroyed, and shall not be reissued, nor shall any other United States notes be issued in their stead; but the total amount of United States notes shall be permanently reduced to the extent of such purchases.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

Substitute the following for the bill:

A BILL to provide for an increase of national-bank notes and the withdrawal and cancellation of an equal amount of United States legal-tender notes, and for the withdrawal and cancellation of the so-called "reserve."

Whereas by section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, it was provided that $25,000,000 of the national-bank notes should be withdrawn from banking associations organized in States having an excess of bank-note circulation, and distributed among States having less than their proportion of such circulation; and whereas it has been found to be impracticable to withdraw said circulation from States having such excess without greatly disturbing the financial, commercial, and other business interests of the country: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to issue to national banking associations organized, or that may be organized, in States and Territories that have not received the proportion of national-bank note circulation to which such States and Territories are entitled under the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved

June 3, 1864, and the several amendments thereto, circulating notes to an amount not exceeding $750,000 per month, until the aggregate amount of such circulating notes so issued shall have reached the sum of $25,000,000 and no more.

SEC. 2. That at the end of each month after the passage of this act the Comptroller of the Currency shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of circulating notes issued under the provisions of the preceding section to national banking associations during the month so ended, whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be redeemed, canceled, and destroyed an amount of United States legal-tender notes equal to the amount of circulating notes so issued, and there shall not be thereafter any legal-tender notes issued to replace those canceled and destroyed as above mentioned: Provided, That the legal-tender notes so canceled and destroyed shall not be considered as any part of the $44,000,000 withdrawn under the provisions of the act of April 12, 1866, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means to support the Government,' approved March 3, 1865," and a portion of which legal-tender notes has been reissued and is now in circulation.

SEC. 3. That when the $25,000,000 above mentioned shall have been issued and an equal amount of United States legal-tender notes redeemed, canceled, and destroyed, or sooner at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to withdraw, cancel, and destroy, in addition to the said $25,000,000, as rapidly as the exigencies of the public service will allow, so much of the issue of the $44,000,000 of legal-tender notes withdrawn under the provisions of the act of April 12, 1866, hereinbefore mentioned, and subsequently reissued, as may then be in circulation, and when they shall have been withdrawn, canceled, and destroyed, it shall not be lawful to replace the legal-tenders so canceled and destroyed without the consent of Congress shall have been first obtained.

SEC. 4. That so much of section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, as authorizes the withdrawal of $25,000,000 of national-bank-notes from banks in States and Territories having more than their share of national-bank note circulation, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Several gentlemen around me request me to renew the proposition I have made on more than one occasion during this discussion, that hereafter debate shall be limited to fifteen-minute speeches.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who is on the floor, is entitled to an hour; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is, by previous assignment, entitled to one-half hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let my proposition operate after those gentlemen have spoken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] asks unanimous consent that after those gentlemen have spoken and until the final disposition of the bill, the debate may proceed in fifteen-minute speeches. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice, then, that whenever I can obtain the floor I shall call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That notification had better be understood by the House. The Chair has been inquired of very often to-day what arrangement the gentleman from Tennessee proposes in regard to voting.

Mr. MAYNARD. My statement is this: After the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] shall have spoken, and the unused time of my associate on the committee [Mr. RANDALL] has been occupied, then, as the House will come to no agreement, I shall be obliged to test the sense of the House by calling the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are a few gentlemen here who do not wish to weary the patience of the House by speeches, but who would each like a few minutes merely to state their positions on this question. If the House would allow a few ten-minute speeches, an opportunity would be afforded for members briefly to put their views on record. This arrangement would facilitate business. I therefore ask the gentleman from Tennessee to renew his proposition. I think that when understood it will not be objected to.

A MEMBER. Say ten minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will then renew the proposition, with the modification that speeches be limited to ten minutes instead of fifteen.

Mr. HOSKINS. Gentlemen can hardly give proper expression to their views in ten-minute speeches. If the limitation were fifteen minutes I do not know that I should object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection that after the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have spoken one hour, the gentleman from Kentucky one-half hour, and after the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] shall have occupied the time to which he is entitled, speeches shall proceed under a fifteen-minute limitation?

Mr. CLEMENTS. For how many weeks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what limit the gentleman from Tennessee assigns to the continuance of debate. If the bill goes over to-morrow, it must of course be carried over into next week.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will allow me to suggest that his proposition happens to hit exactly where my assignment comes in. If there should be an opportunity for me to speak to-day I would accept the disposition of the House, and I should not object to the proposition taking effect to-morrow, if it be the pleasure of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the arrangement to be objected to, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] will proceed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that it does not affect his assignment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is there objection to the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman from Iowa, as I understand, did not make objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood him to make objection unless his rights were preserved.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair misunderstood me; I made an appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to reserve the remainder of the day, because I believe the House will probably adjourn after the gentleman from Kentucky has concluded his speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed, and at the conclusion of his remarks an arrangement can be made if there be unanimous consent. Arrangements by unanimous consent are not matters for debate, and gentleman should agree among themselves before bringing them before the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Connecticut;

An act (H. R. No. 971) to forfeit to the United States certain lands granted to the Placerville and Sacramento Valley Railroad Company, to aid in constructing a railroad from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville, in the State of California;

An act (H. R. No. 519) granting an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague;

An act (H. R. No. 1892) authorizing the Passaic County National Bank of Paterson to change its name; and

An act (H. R. No. 1574) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 509) to withdraw from sale a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and to prescribe the manner in which the remainder of said reservation shall be sold, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made of errors in prize-lists; and

An act (S. No. 249) authorizing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge, to date the 7th of June, 1870.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill. Although I have a high regard for the eminent ability and the great congressional experience of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] yet I cannot agree with him in his views concerning this bill. To me it is a bill which provides for unlimited inflation of the currency, with all its mischievous consequences. To me it is a measure which authorizes free banking; and I do not know that I have ever heard a more convincing argument against the evils of free banking than that which was uttered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] who has just taken his seat, and who occupied the place where I now stand. He has given us the experience of his native State with regard to it. He has told us that although the banks of that Commonwealth had the security of the whole of the State, and although their currency was based upon the bonds of that Commonwealth which were at that time, as I am informed, at par, yet it appears that the currency of the free banks of Indiana so secured was at a discount of from 5 to 75 per cent. And it happens to me to know, in my own business experience from 1857 to 1861, that the notes of the banks of Indiana were so depreciated, based though they were on free-banking principles and the credit of the State, that the business men of that State went to Vermont, went to Massachusetts, to Connecticut, and to Rhode Island for a more reliable currency. And I myself have paid a heavy premium in order to get the notes of New England to replace the notes of the free banks of the State of Indiana.

I am opposed to this bill, sir, because it allows unlimited inflation. There are but four hundred millions of United States bonds deposited by the banks as security for their circulation. That leaves thirteen hundred millions outside of the banks, and the only limitation there may be to the currency expansion under this bill, upon the establishment of free banks, will be the amount of that bonded debt which can be taken up and put into the hands of associations anxious to carry on the business of free banking, and that can be forced into the channels of circulation and of the trade and business of the country.

I object to this bill again because it is a surrender of the rights and duties of the Congress of the United States. I oppose it because it is a surrender of that great principle of sovereignty—under that provision of the Constitution which requires the Congress of the United States to provide a sound and safe currency for the people and to regulate the value thereof. I say, then, that it is a surrender of that great right and power to comparatively irresponsible associations to change the value of the money of the people from day to day. This body, representing the people of the United States, would not dare to give to any man the right to debase the gold coin of the nation. And if any man outside of this House, or within it, were to endeavor to coin gold dollars that should have but twenty grains of gold instead of twenty-five, if any man should undertake so far to debase that coin as to take away 20 per cent. of it, and strive to pass it upon the people as a dollar of the nation, he would be sent to the penitentiary. And yet here, to-day, the gentlemen who represent the inflation side of this question are asking that we shall give into the hands of irresponsible corporations, the hundreds and thousands of them that will start up under this bill, the right to debase the currency of the people not only 5, but 10, 20, or perhaps 50 per cent., according to the extent of the currency inflation that they may authorize.

The debasement of the currency in the one case would be against the law; in the other, it would be under the forms of the law, but the evil consequences to the people in both cases would be the same.

I repeat that we will be recreant to the duty that we owe to our constituents if we fail to hold our hands, and that with a stern grasp, upon the currency of the country, and to keep it from overflowing its bounds and swelling into that inflation which will sweep everything before it into universal ruin.

Now, sir, this bill, and all the free-banking bills here, are founded upon a great and fundamental error. They are founded upon the erroneous idea that the currency of the banks, when it goes out of the banks and performs its functions, will return to them again for redemption. Sir, the history of the world is all against it. You cannot find, from the time of John Law, one hundred and fifty years ago, down to the present hour, anything in any system of banking institutions that will show that when the paper currency of a country begins to expand, and gets beyond that point where the ordinary and legitimate wants of the people require it, but that it goes onward and upward, increasing outward all the time, and never brought back for redemption unless by the hard hand of a panic and a suspension of payments.

I need only refer you casually, as I go along, to the fact that at the death of Louis XIV he left the French nation deeply impoverished. I refer you to the fact that John Law, a Scotch adventurer, at that time went over to France and got into the confidence of the Regent of Orleans. The nation was deeply in debt; the currency was debased. John Law inaugurated the Mississippi scheme with the plausible pretense of working the mines of Louisiana. In connection with that he was allowed to establish the Bank of France, and that bank was authorized to issue some fifty or sixty million dollars of paper currency. It was found that that small addition to the money circulation gave a large impetus to the commerce of the nation; and men, reasoning then, as they do here now, that if a small amount of currency will do a great good a larger amount of currency will do an amount of good proportionately greater, urged upon the Regent to expand the loans of the bank, and they were expanded several hundred million livres. The result of all this was to increase the operations of trade; to give great activity to manufactures; to agriculture, and to commerce. Everything seemed prosperous, and as this seeming prosperity progressed, the shares of the Mississippi bubble advanced in price; and as they went up they required more currency to float them along and to deal and trade in them. The result of it was that there was a larger demand upon the bank for currency; and more money was issued until there were 2,700,000,000 livres afloat among the people.

Then it was that one man, a little more sagacious than the rest, the Prince of Condé, took it into his head to see whether or not this was all a sound prosperity, or whether it was only a bubble. He applied to the bank for the redemption of some of their bills. He obtained money for them in gold and silver, but immediately thereafter distrust began to arise; and the Regent, in order to back up the falling credit of the bank, required him to send back the specie. He did it under compulsion; but afterward, he and others of the same mind who knew of the hollowness of affairs in the bank withdrew quietly their money, sent it abroad in order to be safe; and the result of the great inflation was that a panic ensued and the whole fabric of the prosperity of the nation fell into one indiscriminate mass of ruin. Thousands upon thousands of men were overwhelmed, and the whole trade of the nation stagnated thereafter for years. The bubble had burst, it had dissolved into thin air, and disappeared from view as rapidly as the glittering ice palace of Potemkin, reared in honor of his imperial mistress, disappeared before the summer sun.

I need not speak, in continuation of the subject, with regard to our continental currency, any further than to say that although at first when we issued it it was at par, yet as our fathers put issue upon issue till they had three hundred and fifty-seven millions of it afloat, it collapsed and sank down to nothing. It fell so low that one dollar in silver in 1781 would buy seventy-five dollars of the currency.

Coming down in the track of time, let us take a passing glance at the history of France during her revolution. She was encircled by the banded nations of Europe anxious for her destruction because she was then a standing reproach to the monarchical principle, and in her mighty struggle she issued forth assignats to the amount of thousands of millions of dollars. But the consequences were that in the end it became so depreciated that the butcher and the baker and all the tradesmen of the city of Paris would not bring their products to market nor take a dollar of that currency, notwithstanding that the government stood behind it pledged with all the revenues of the nation, with all the confiscated lands of the nobility, with all the lands of the church and nation, with everything that the nation possessed, in order to sustain it. Behind all these were laws that made it criminal to refuse to take the currency; yet it became so utterly worthless that the people of Paris were brought to the verge of starvation; bread riots ensued, men were crushed to death while waiting at the butcher and the baker shops for their turn to get that food which was denied them, and the government had to step in and confiscate by force, wherever it could, provisions wherewith to feed the starving multitude; for confidence in the currency and between man and man was utterly destroyed.

This, sir, is the history of inflation in other countries as well as our own. I say, then, Mr. Speaker, that it is the experience of the world that there is no kind of elasticity in a paper currency with the single exception of an elasticity outward. It never decreases its volume unless with the hard gripe of a panic and with the suspension of payment, unless with the utter ruin of thousands and tens of thousands of individuals who may have trusted in its promises.

Sir, during the holidays last Christmas it occurred to me to make for my own satisfaction a chart or diagram from the official tables whereby I might see for myself, according to the plan adopted by statisticians, the progress of the currency and banking and the commerce of the United States for the last forty years; and as we can more readily take in great facts by the eye at a glance than we can take them in by long words of explanation, I will exhibit this diagram and show that the experience of our country for the last forty years has been precisely the experience of all other countries. [Mr. TOWNSEND here held up at the Clerk's desk the diagram referred to.] Here, Mr. Speaker, is an illustration of the upward movement of the currency and of the foreign commerce of the nation for the period mentioned.

Mr. BIERY. I rise to a question of order. I ask that gentlemen shall keep their seats.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Chair to request gentlemen to take their seats.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. LOUGHRIDGE in the chair.) The House will come to order and gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It will be remembered that in 1832 the President of the United States vetoed the charter of the Bank of the United States. You will remember that in 1833 Mr. Taney removed the deposits. You also remember he encouraged all the banks of the country thus favored with the deposits to lend as freely as they could to the people of the United States the deposits belonging to the United States. The result was that they began in 1834 expanding the currency from the amount of ninety-five million dollars to one hundred and forty-nine millions in 1837; and the combined circulation and deposits from one hundred and seventy-one to two hundred and seventy-six millions; and that they expanded the loans and discounts from three hundred and thirty millions up to five hundred and twenty-eight millions while the specie decreased from forty-four to thirty-eight millions. The result of this great expansion was that there was a panic, a suspension of specie payments, and the whole business of the country collapsed and came down to ruin. So we proceeded onward in our downward course.

The banks suspended in 1837. They resumed in New York in May, 1838, and in Pennsylvania in August, 1838. Then again they suspended on October 10, 1839; and the State of Pennsylvania, believing that this matter of currency and resumption of specie payments was a mere matter of legislation, in 1840 ordered the banks of the State to resume specie payments on the 12th day of January, 1841. They did resume specie payments according to the order, because they were under the necessity of doing it upon the penalty that if they did not resume the charters of all would be taken away. But it was a commercial question rather than a legislative one. They remained in resumption only about four weeks, when they suspended in 1841 and did not resume till March 22, 1842. It took till 1843 to make a sufficient reduction of circulation and deposits, and it was not till that line had fallen from two hundred and seventy-six to one hundred and fourteen millions that a permanent resumption took place. Now, I have said that there is no voluntary contraction of the currency by the banks. You will notice the currency and deposit line going up here all the way regularly enough from 1843 to 1857. In that period the circulation and deposits expanded from one hundred and fourteen to four hundred and forty-five millions, and the discount line from two hundred and eighty-three to the enormous amount of seven hundred and forty-four millions, the specie only increasing in that time from fifty-six to fifty-eight millions.

This outstretching of the credit system was far beyond the wants of legitimate commerce, and a panic ensued with the usual disastrous consequences. Those who choose to read the Bankers' Magazine of October, 1857, will find that precisely the same influences that brought on that panic brought on the panic of 1873.

Mr. MERRIAM. Is that on a gold basis?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir; it was on a gold basis. This was the result of the expansion of the currency, the onward and upward movement of the circulation and deposits.

Then again we resumed in 1858, and went onward and upward till the war came on in 1861, having in that time increased the circulation and deposits from three hundred and forty-one to four hundred and eighty-one millions, and the discount line from six hundred and forty-three to seven hundred and seventy-one millions when a suspension of payment took place again, because of the action of the Government of the United States in requiring the loans to the Government to be made in gold, instead of their notes. Had it not been for that action, the banks would have held out much longer and the country would have been saved many millions, lost by depreciation of the currency, under the sub-treasury system. The condition of the currency was abnormal during the war. But after the new banking system was established inflation commenced again. From January, 1866, to the panic in 1873 the bank-note circulation increased from two hundred and fifty-nine to three hundred and forty millions, the legal-tenders receded from four hundred and fifty-one to four hundred and twenty-six millions, the deposit line went up from five hundred and fifty-two to six hundred and thirty-nine millions, and the discount line from five hundred and one to nine hundred and forty millions, while the specie in the banks advanced from nineteen to thirty-four millions only. This was enormous inflation, more rapid and more extensive than any heretofore known in our history.

The argument that currency returns after "movement of the crops" is refuted in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shows by the quarterly returns that the currency was regularly expanding with but few exceptions during the whole of this period.

When the touchstone of payment came to be applied to one or two great banking-houses, the hollowness of all this seeming prosperity was made manifest, and the whole fabric of false credit went tottering to its fall.

From this statement it will be seen that we have been drifting steadily and rapidly away from specie payments; for in 1861 we had one hundred and two millions of specie in our vaults to meet the demands of four hundred and eighty-one millions of circulation and deposits, with two hundred millions more among the people, while in 1873 we had but thirty-four millions of specie in the banks, eighty millions in the Treasury, or about one hundred and forty millions in banks, Treasury, and with the people, against three hundred and thirty-four millions of bank circulation, four hundred and twenty-six millions of greenbacks, and six hundred and thirty-nine millions of deposits; or thirteen hundred and ninety-nine millions of immediate liabilities in all. In the first instance the proportion of specie to immediate liabilities was as one to four and seven-tenths, while in the latter it was as one to twelve and three-tenths dollars. Thus has the breach been widening, and now we propose to make it wider. Is it wisdom so to do?

But this exhibit conveys a still more important lesson to the manufacturer and mechanic and every laborer in the country. This onward and upward movement of the currency has a direct influence upon foreign trade, and you will find that accordingly as the currency expands imports will be coming into the country and exports will not go out in proportion. The reason is that this inflation of the currency makes this country the best market in the world. Everything is brought here for sale; commodities of all kinds come here, and you will find by this diagram that as the currency goes upward the line of imports also expands until suspension comes when it comes down again. The exports also decrease under inflation, for the high prices here caused by an inflated currency render the prices of our manufactured products so high that they cannot compete with the products of foreign nations. And here is a remarkable instance of the fact that the withdrawal of the currency brings the balance of foreign commerce in our favor.

In 1866 we passed the contraction act. From 1866 to 1868 we reduced the legal-tenders $44,000,000, and during the same time we reduced the imports of the country from $431,000,000 to $349,000,000 per annum; so that the movement of the currency affects not only the internal commerce of the country, but it affects all the foreign commerce as well, and consequently and directly it affects the interests of every man throughout the land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say with regard to the effect of an inflated currency upon foreign imports and upon our own exports that during the highest period of inflation, the seven years from 1865 to 1873, our exports in merchandise amounted to $2,891,000,000, and our imports in merchandise to $3,731,000,000, and our import of coin and bullion was $84,000,000, against our export of coin and bullion of $539,000,000.

The excess of merchandise imported was therefore $840,000,000, to pay which we exported of our own home-produced gold $455,000,000, leaving to be settled by bonds, or in some other way, $384,000,000.

But take the whole period for forty-three years and we find a still more remarkable state of affairs. In that period of time we imported in merchandise $9,707,000,000, and we exported in merchandise $8,026,000,000, making the excess of imports of merchandise over the exports of the products of our labor $1,681,000,000; and for that great indebtedness we paid $1,019,000,000 in coin and bullion, raised out of the bowels of the earth, leaving us to pay in bonds $661,000,000 in order to settle the balances. From this unfortunate balance of trade against us we are suffering to-day.

Now, my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] the other day said that he had very little faith in this matter of the balance of trade. I have, sir; it is a very important element in our political economy. He put the case in this shape: That if we exported $100,000 worth of produce, and with it bought $120,000 worth of commodities, although the custom-house will show $20,000 against us, yet in reality we were the gainers; but he forgot to state the fact that while we were trading in that way, merchants on the other side might be trading in precisely the same manner, and that if England sent over to our country $100,000 worth of dry goods or cutlery, and got from us $120,000 worth of flour or other commodities for it she would gain $20,000, although the custom-house might show $20,000 against that country, so that the several transactions would thus balance each other. Now these exchanges are going on all the time. The true balances of trade are those which we have to pay in hard coin and in bonds or securities beyond the amount of produce we can furnish. What that amount was I have just shown.

Mr. Speaker, the inflation from 1865 to 1873 was that which brought about the recent panic. The Comptroller of the Currency in his last very able annual report ascribes largely the effects of the panic to the railroad extension of the country, and tells you that in the last five years $1,700,000,000 have been invested in railroads, at a rate of $340,000,000 a year, and that that was one of the great producing causes of the panic, aided, however, by the operations of the banks acting in sympathy with the stock boards, making loans on call, paying interest on deposits, certifying checks without deposits to meet them, and thus inflating the currency and credit system of the country in various ways. Its disastrous effect upon the people through the railroads may be seen in the fact that on the 1st day of January, 1874, one hundred and fifteen railroads of the nation whose coupons and dividends were payable in New York defaulted to the amount of $27,000,000, then due and payable. I will read from the North American of February 26, 1874, a statement of the condition of Minnesota, which has been brought about by the late inflation of the national currency:

> The State of Minnesota is one immense railroad cemetery. Her new State reports show that her seventeen hundred miles operated last year did not earn enough to meet the interest on the funded debt and the running expenses by $3,840,000. The gross earnings were $5,535,000, the net $1,111,000, or less than a quarter of the interest on the bonds. Seven roads, operating two hundred and twenty-four miles, do not pay their running expenses. Every mile of the road is covered by nearly $15,000 of stock and $41,000 of bonds. The unpaid and overdue coupons amount to $3,740,000, most of them of recent date.

As it is with Minnesota so it may be, perhaps to a less extent, with other Western States.

And yet gentlemen say that all is lovely and prosperous among the railroads of the West. Sir, it was this great inflation of the currency that brought about the bankruptcy of Jay Cooke & Co., and brought down with that company ruin to thousands of people. In looking over the list of creditors of Jay Cooke & Co., which I hold in my hand, I find them of every kind, character, and condition, from the poor laborer, the depositor of twenty-five dollars, the widow, and the clergyman with their small accounts, to the banker, the depositer of $25,000, no one of whom, so far as I have heard, has yet received a single dollar by way of dividends. They owe two thousand people or more, and their indebtedness amounts to nearly $9,000,000. I do not want again to see an inflation of the currency that will make it possible for one firm to get so much in debt as to draw into its coffers the money of the multitude and to carry so much ruin and despair to so many individuals of this country.

We see the effect of this inflation of the currency still further in the number of bankruptcies that have taken place throughout the country in the last three years. In 1870 they amounted to 3,551, with an indebtedness of $88,000,000. In 1872 there were 4,069, with an indebtedness of $121,000,000. In 1873 the number had increased to the enormous amount of 5,183, with $228,500,000 of indebtedness that they were unable to pay.

The great inflation of the credit system, by the increase of bank and national circulation between 1866 and 1873 from seven hundred and ten to seven hundred and sixty-six millions and of loans and discounts from $501,000,000 to $940,000,000, was one of the greatest financial bubbles we have ever blown.

Beautiful to the eye of the child is its bubble of soap and water, and as it expands, its prismatic colors racing over the surface reflect all surrounding objects and become more brilliant and more charming as the bubble enlarges, and most dazzling when at its greatest tenuity until it finally bursts leaving but a drop of water.

Just so do the financial bubbles of men, the boys of larger growth, charm, beguile, and deceive the eye, as prices rise, as profits are realized, as stocks go up, as business increases under the expansion of a plethoric currency and an increasing credit system, until the rough hand of demand of payment grasps them, when they shatter into ruined fragments, like the bubble of the child, leaving but fragmentary remains to show their former existence.

Notwithstanding all this ruin and despair throughout the land, my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] the gentleman from Indiana who so eloquently spoke here yesterday, [Mr. ORTH,] and his colleague who has addressed us to-day, [Mr. COBURN,] say that all is prosperous and serene throughout the country. They point us to the railroads that have been laid down and the furnaces, forges, and rolling-mills that have been set up. They point us to the cities that are being built up around us. But they forget, Mr. Speaker, to tell you that these improvements have been made at a fearful cost, leaving a heavy permanent indebtedness. They forget to tell you that the country in its national capacity owes $2,000,000,000. They forget to tell you that for these railroads which they speak of the country owes $4,000,000,000. They forget to tell you that the municipal debt of the country is $1,000,000,000. They forget to tell you of the other indebtedness of the people, amounting in all to more than $10,000,000,000, or 30 per cent. of the whole real and personal estate of the nation, which the people lie under to-day. Every year $600,000,000 of interest is grinding out the faces of the poor; $600,000,000 is working against the capital and against the industry of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, this matter of interest is a thing that never sleeps; it works all the time. It is hard at its task while we are sleeping. It grows with what it feeds on and is ever accumulating. It follows us in our midnight dreams and in our busy hours. It is with us at the festal board and at the marriage feast. It follows us to the open grave of our friends. Always, everywhere, wherever we may be, it cries out in our ears, "Pay me that thou owest." It is thus crying out to-day everywhere, wherever these improvements as they are called have been made. Everywhere throughout the land there is no man exempt from this cry of interest. We all have to answer it in one capacity or another. If we pay a single penny of tax to the Government, if we purchase anything at all that comes within the reach of railroad influence by transportation, or of municipal improvements, we have to answer that cry, "Pay me that thou owest," and contribute our share.

This is where we are brought. Gentlemen point us to these improvements as the evidences of the great prosperity of the country brought about by the inflation or the expansion of the currency. Yet they forget to tell us that in my own State of Pennsylvania as well as elsewhere there are some furnaces, forges, and rolling-mills that are idle and some working only half time. They forget to tell us that throughout the great West there are railroads half finished and abandoned. They forget to remind us that to-day in New York there are fifty thousand people walking the streets of that great city not one of them knowing in the morning where he will get his evening meal. And they call this the evidence of the great prosperity of the country brought about by the large amount of circulating medium issued by the banks and the Government. The workingmen whose children are crying for bread do not share in their enthusiasm.

This condition of affairs it is to which we are brought by the inflation of the currency. It is the condition of the people of the country during the old continental times. These gentlemen want to circulate great masses of money freely throughout the country; they want to have cheap money and in great abundance; they want to have it so expanded that it will raise the price of everything, as it did during the revolutionary war; they want to bring us back to the colonial currency which was used by our forefathers, of which there was great abundance in that time, and although it was made legal tender for the payment of debts, and although penalties were denounced against those who refused to take it, it depreciated until at last it went down so low that a single dollar of specie would buy seventy-five dollars of that kind of paper. I have a lot of it here; and "thereby hangs a tale." An ancestor of mine, in the latter part of the revolutionary war, sold a farm for £1,200, and took his pay in this kind of money. Although it was then depreciated, he thought it would come up again. He kept it, relying upon the faith of the Government that it would eventually be made good, until finally it sank down to nothing. About a bushel of this paper came down to his descendants; and in the general distribution of it I received a couple of quarts for my share; and here is a portion of it—the "cheap money" of the ancient times.

Mr. BIERY. Will my colleague allow me one question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No, sir.

Mr. BIERY. I only wanted to ask the gentleman how much he would take for that money now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. A dollar a quart.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the condition to which we are likely to be reduced by the passage of this bill. There will be no escape from it. There is no financial panacea whereby you can escape from the payment of your debts. My friend from Tennessee is endeavoring to devise a means whereby the Government can evade the payment of its obligations. I want to remind him that he is endeavoring to drive us on to repudiation; and, as he is a classical scholar, I want him to remember that this state of affairs was described two thousand years ago. I want him to remember the oft-quoted sentiment of Virgil, "Facilis descensus Averni, sed revocare gradum, hic labor, hoc opus est;" which means, when liberally translated into our vernacular, that the Government may easily issue a large batch of shin-plasters, but it will be hard work and hard labor to redeem them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as the waning minutes of my hour are fast passing away, I can only say that if we want to have a sound and stable currency there is but one way to accomplish it, and that is to have a currency redeemable in specie. There is no other method. We are drifting away from that basis. The breach between paper and gold is widening. As you saw by the diagram I showed you, we are going further and further away from the specie touch-stone. So long as we have an irredeemable paper currency we shall have a currency that no man can trust for twenty-four hours. In making a contract to-day, payable ten days hence, you can never know what you will either have to give or to receive in a paper currency; you can never know how to make your contracts; you can never know whether you will gain or lose by its fluctuations. Consequently, all values will be disturbed and all contracts will be of a very unsafe and unsatisfactory character.

Mr. Speaker, who is it that asks inflation? Is it the man engaged in the legitimate business of the country? Is it the laboring man? Is it not the speculator, the broker, the man who reaps his harvest out of a fluctuating currency? the speculator, who, holding depressed stock, wants a large amount of paper currency afloat in order that his stock may rise, and that by means of the rise he may get out of the unfortunate situation in which he stands?

Mr. BIERY. If my colleague will go home with me I will show him plenty of furnace-men who are asking for an increase of currency.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have gone home to my own constituents; I was there last week. I talked to the mechanics; I talked to the farmers; I conversed with the citizens of the town. I talked to a hundred people, all of whom said, "What is Congress going to do? We hope and trust that they are not going to inflate the currency." I did not hear a single man, from the humblest mechanic to the richest banker, who was not opposed to any inflation of the currency, who was not opposed to the $400,000,000 bill and the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] The party is against it. We have pledged ourselves repeatedly that at the very earliest period we will bring about a redeemable paper currency; that we will come back to specie payments. We have solemnly pledged ourselves—republicans, democrats, all of us have pledged ourselves—to the people that we will give them a redeemable currency in which they may safely deal, so that when they make a contract to-day to be paid or consummated next week or next month they may know what they will have to pay or to receive.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask how many national banks there are in his town?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There are two national banks in my town. Both of them are willing and anxious that the currency should be made redeemable. I say that the republican party and the democratic party alike stand pledged to the redemption of all the currency of the country, national-bank and greenback, in specie. We stand face to face with our constituents with that pledge upon us. If there be any faith at all in politicians, if any faith is to be placed in platforms, if we have not willfully deceived the people, we are pledged to do our utmost to bring about the resumption of specie payments.

When Secretary McCulloch, in 1865, spoke of the evils of our then inflated currency, we pledged ourselves, in John B. Alley's resolution, that we would contract it. We followed up our pledge by the act of 1866, and abandoned it in 1868, after only forty-four millions of contraction. When General Grant came into power we again pledged ourselves to a redemption of the greenbacks in coin at an early day. We reiterated that pledge in our national platform of 1872, and yet we are here at this hour preparing to violate those pledges by the passage of a bill that admits of indefinite inflation, and the postponement of resumption perhaps forever.

The people are as yet forbearing, but they begin to speak out. They have spoken through their National Board of Trade; through their clearing-houses; through great meetings in New York and Boston; and the State of New York, through her governor, joins in the great demand that we should prepare for resumption.

That voice is too powerful to be allowed to pass unheeded. As a party we are responsible for the financial measures of the Government; and if we do not respond to the great and swelling voice of the multitude, but persist in measures that must lead to insolvency and repudiation, our party will be swept from power and the places that know us now will know us no more forever.

A government that has gone so far in the issue of a depreciated currency that it is troubled to redeem it, and seeks to evade its obligations, is on the high road to repudiation. I fear that we are on that high road now. We have not the courage to stand here and say that we are determined to bring about the resumption of specie payments, because we have introduced a bill that will indefinitely postpone it. We are afraid of the speculators. We are afraid of the men whose interest it is to inflate prices and lift them up so they may unload their worthless stock in Wall street, and put it off on unsuspecting purchasers.

Mr. Speaker, it becomes more difficult every day to resume. It will be more difficult to-morrow than to-day if we issue another dollar. It will be more difficult next week than it is this if we continue expansion. There is nothing will bring us down to the resumption of specie payments but a curtailment of the currency of the nation. We must face the music now or soon hereafter. Let us do it now.

We are endeavoring to find out some financial nostrum whereby we can get out of the difficulty in which we are. There is but one way to do it, and that is to retrace our steps. Just as we got into our difficulties by expansion we have to come out of them by contraction. There is no other way under heaven and known to men. Gentlemen may bring bills in and make all sorts of arrangements to pay at a distant time, but unless we begin now, to-day, with the right kind of a bill to resume specie payments at a reasonably early period, we will never be able to pay the bills which are out, and they will only be discharged by panic and eventual repudiation and ruin.

We lost a golden opportunity not long ago, when the currency of the country was within 7 per cent. of gold. We lost it when we began to agitate here for an inflation of the currency, and induced the people to believe we intended to inflate. And when the $400,000,000 bill was passed here, without opportunity of debate, when it was passed through under a pressure, and without a chance for a single sentiment for or against it to be expressed in this House, the bankers, brokers, and speculators of Wall street saw there was a chance for them there. Stocks and gold went up immediately because of our action, and they are to-day 1 or 1½ per cent., and some of them 2 or 3 per cent., higher than they were before our action.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no financial panacea to offer; but I propose to offer a bill, which I ask to have printed, as an amendment to be offered to this bill, and which will have a tendency toward resumption of specie payments. It is a bill whereby I propose to satisfy the people of the South and West in their demands for the currency to which they are entitled under the act of 1870. Under that act they were entitled to $54,000,000 to take the place of the 3 per cents, and $25,000,000 more to be taken from existing circulation; but it has been found impossible to wrest from the bankers of New England and New York the excess of $25,000,000 they have on hand.

Mr. MAYNARD. In Pennsylvania?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Some perhaps in Pennsylvania. I now propose a bill which will give to the gentlemen of the South and West who want bank capital that $25,000,000. I propose in this bill that the Comptroller of the Currency shall issue to those States which have not had their amount of currency $750,000 a month until the $25,000,000 shall have been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MYERS. I hope my colleague will be allowed to continue until he concludes his speech.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to that.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have provided in my bill that the Southern and Western States who have not got their amount of currency shall have $25,000,000 more, in $750,000 monthly installments, and at the end of every month the Comptroller of the Currency shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of currency thus issued, and there shall be then canceled of greenbacks of the Government an equal amount, so that the currency will not thus be inflated. I provide in another section that as much of the $44,000,000 as may be out shall be withdrawn, so that the whole currency of the country when the bill takes effect shall be precisely what it was before the excess of greenbacks was issued. There will then be $331,000,000 of greenbacks afloat, being $51,000,000 less than now; making the Government that much nearer resumption, and adding $25,000,000 to the national-bank currency. That is as far as the people will go today. I submit it as my judgment to the House. Then, at the next session of Congress, if we think right, we can cause a reduction to be brought about by the issue of 3 per cent. notes to a certain but reasonable extent, and payable at a future time, to take the place of legal-tenders, and bring the greenback circulation eventually down so low the nation could redeem without any disadvantage or trouble, and the banks could follow in its wake with ease.

Thanking the House for the attention given me, I conclude my remarks.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice unless an agreement is come to, when the speeches are through which are now contracted for, to limit debate to ten-minute speeches I shall call the previous question.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency a bill which I had hoped would receive its favorable consideration, my special object being to substitute United States notes having all the qualities of national-bank notes for the notes of the banks, and to make banking practically free by a system which, while it would prevent undue inflation of the currency, would give the people and not the banks the benefit of the credit of the Government and enable the Government to furnish a basis for banking on its own convertible bonds at a low rate of interest, instead of putting, as is now done, the whole credit of the country into the hands of a favored set of bondholders, or of simply extending it, as the bill presented by the committee does, to the present holders of our bonds. I desire to read its provisions for the information of the House, as I intend, if the previous question can be voted down on the committee's bill, to offer mine as a substitute and have it referred to the Committee of the Whole for amendment, being very well aware that it is far from being perfect. I want to amend it by making one-half of the customs duties (all ought to be) payable in currency.

The bill reads as follows:

A bill to provide a uniform currency by the retirement of national-bank notes and substitution of Treasury notes and 3.65 per cent. bonds, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue, in manner as hereinafter prescribed, on the faith and credit of the Government, $400,000,000 of Treasury notes, payable on demand in United States legal-tender notes, at the Treasury and at such United States depositories as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate. Said notes shall be similar in form and appearance to the said legal-tender notes, and may be of denominations not less than one dollar, nor more than $10,000, and shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, claims, and demands due to the United States, and of all claims and demands against the United States, to the same extent that national-bank notes are receivable and no further.

SEC. 2. That the Treasury notes authorized herein to be issued shall only be issued to the extent that national-bank notes shall be returned by national banks for cancellation and destruction, as provided in section 9 of this act, and shall only be used in the purchase of the United States bonds commonly called "five-twenties."

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue from time to time, on demand, in exchange at par for legal-tender notes of the United States, the bonds of the United States in denominations of fifty dollars or any multiple thereof; said bonds to be called United States convertible bonds, to bear interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, and principal and interest payable on demand in legal-tender notes of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to redeem said bonds on demand at the Treasury of the United States, at the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and at such other convenient places within the United States as he may designate for that purpose, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and whenever said bonds are presented and paid as aforesaid, the same shall be immediately canceled and stamped with the word "paid" on the face thereof, and the same shall be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, monthly, cause the bonds so paid to be destroyed in the presence of the Treasurer of the United States and Register of the Treasury, of which destruction a record shall be made showing the date, denomination, number, and date of payment of each bond, in a book to be provided for that purpose, and signed by the officers aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That the $50,000,000 of legal-tender United States notes, authorized by existing laws to be issued in addition to the $400,000,000 contemplated for permanent circulation, shall be prepared and held as a reserve for the redemption and payment of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by section 1 and of the convertible bonds authorized to be issued by section 3 of this act.

SEC. 6. That the money received in exchange for convertible bonds shall only be used in the purchase of the bonds of the United States called five-twenties, and in keeping a reserve for the payment of the principal and interest of the convertible bonds when demanded, which reserve shall be of such an amount as, in addition to the $50,000,000 mentioned in section 5 of this act, shall be sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary, to insure their prompt redemption. Whenever any portion of said $50,000,000 shall have been used in the redemption of Treasury notes or convertible bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell to the highest bidder, for United States legal-tender notes, any of the bonds now authorized by law to be issued for funding the public debt, to an amount sufficient to restore to the Treasury all of said $50,000,000 that shall have been used as aforesaid. Such sale of bonds shall be made upon due notice by advertisement and upon biddings made by sealed proposals.

SEC. 7. That all further issue of national-bank notes to national banks by the Comptroller of the Currency, whether for the renewal of defaced and torn bank-notes or for any other purpose, is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 8. That in lieu of the tax of 1 per cent. per annum now imposed by law on the outstanding circulation of national banks, a tax of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in gold, shall be collected upon the circulation which has been issued to each national bank which has not been returned for cancellation. This tax shall be collected by withholding one-half of said tax semi-annually from the semi-annual interest upon the registered bonds deposited by said banks as security for their circulation; and if the interest of said registered bonds is payable in currency, there shall be retained of said currency the equivalent of said tax at the market premium on gold, which premium shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That each national bank may withdraw any part of its United States registered bonds deposited as security for the redemption of its circulation by paying into the proper department of the Treasury $900 of its circulation for each $1,000 of bonds so withdrawn, and may withdraw all of said registered bonds by paying a sum equal to its whole circulation, in its own bank-notes, and United States legal-tender notes, or wholly in either of them; and thereupon the United States shall be bound to redeem, on demand, the whole of such circulation of said bank which shall be outstanding. When such circulation is redeemed or paid into the Treasury as provided herein, it shall be destroyed in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 10. That the United States legal-tender notes paid into the Treasury under the provisions of section 9 shall only be used, first, for redeeming the circulation for which it was paid into the Treasury, for doing which promptly a sufficient reserve shall be kept in aid of the fund provided in section 5; and, secondly, in purchasing United States five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 11. That whenever the Secretary of the Treasury may think it expedient, he may use any coin in the Treasury not required for the payment of demands against the United States payable in coin, in redeeming any United States five-twenty bonds that have become payable at the pleasure of the Government, the market value of which coin, as fixed by said Secretary, shall be substituted by Treasury notes issued by authority of this act, or by legal-tender notes received under the authority of this act, which shall thereupon become subject to be used in the Treasury for the payment of all claims and demands against the United States.

SEC. 12. That no purchases of United States five-twenty bonds shall be made under the provisions of section 2 or sections 6 and 10 of this act when the price demanded shall be at a greater rate of premium upon the bonds than 10 per cent. above their par value of principal and accrued interest; nor shall any redemption of said bonds be made in pursuance of section 11 while the premium on gold is above 10 per cent. in lawful money.

Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt to discuss this bill in detail now; if the previous question is sustained on the bill of the committee the House will not be able to consider it. If the previous question is not sustained I will have opportunity to explain it under the debate in Committee of the Whole; and as I am limited to thirty minutes, I propose, first, to consider specially an amendment which I have offered to the bill of the committee; that done, I will devote my remaining time to advocating the general principles of my bill, and in stating my objections to the bill of the committee.

Last Saturday week, when the bill was being considered, I submitted the following amendment:

Add as an additional section:

Be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent. per month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money, but not including that in the vault of the bank, or redeemed and on deposit for said bank; and all provisions of existing law in conflict with the foregoing provisions are hereby repealed.

I followed the language of the present law literally except in the change of rate from $\frac{1}{12}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent. per month, which I propose to show is not more than a fair rate of charge for the money loaned to the banks by the Government. I know the bankers and their advocates will raise a clamor against it, and cry aloud as to the oppression and destruction which such a proposition, if entertained, would bring upon all their interests; indeed, I have been told that it is too absurd to be seriously considered. I hear so much of that almost every day before the Committee on Ways and Means from the protected monopolists that it has ceased to make any impression on me. I have yet to see the first man, or combination of men, who did not resist bitterly all attempts to curtail his special privileges or to free the people from his extortions.

Let us look at the matter fairly. Men who hold bonds of the United States which they bought and paid for with legal-tenders at par, many of them having sold gold for the greenbacks they bought the bonds with when one gold dollar was worth at least two in paper, will hardly stand up here and claim that they have either been oppressed or neglected when they alone of all the creditors of the Government have succeeded in having laws passed paying the principal of their bonds in gold while other public creditors, no matter how meritorious, have to receive their pay in the currency of the country.

I presume three-fourths of all the bonds now held by national bankers were bought with legal-tenders at par; but as I cannot prove that, and want to present the question fairly, I am willing to concede that the bonds cost them on the average 10 per cent. premium. Upon that assumption, which is certainly all the bankers can claim, and assuming 7 per cent., which is the legal rate of interest in the State of New York as the average value of money, let us apply the test. It requires $110 to buy a hundred-dollar bond of the United States; the interest on the money invested is $7.70 per annum; the bond bears 6 per cent. interest in gold. Put the premium on that down to 10 per cent.; the interest on the bond (payable semi-annually) is $6.60. In addition to that, the Government loans to the bondholder, as a national banker, ninety dollars on every hundred-dollar bond he deposits as security, requiring him to hold in reserve (which I will assume he does, though we all know that to be a fiction,) 15 per cent. of the ninety dollars so loaned, leaving him for his own use $76.50, the interest on which, at 7 per cent., is $5.35. How does the account stand?

United States, Dr.

To $110 invested, worth 7 per cent.	$7 70

United States, Cr.

By $100 United States bond, interest	$6 60
By $76.50 loaned by United States, 7 per cent	5 35
Deduct 3 per cent. tax on $90 circulation to United States	2 70
Leaves		9 25

Or a clear profit of $1.55 per cent. to the banker after paying the tax I propose on the whole currency loaned by the Government, while the increase of the tax from 1 to 3 per cent. would add annually $7,000,000 to the revenues of the country.

I would like to know from what source that amount of revenue can be so justly and equitably raised as from the national banks, if we are to be cursed by their continuance. I would like some gentleman to explain why a bondholder should be entitled to borrow money from the Government at a lower rate of interest than any other citizen; or why the national banker should have the money of the people put into his hands at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum to be loaned to the men from whom it was taken by taxation at the rate of (say) 7 per cent. per annum, to enable the bondholding banker to pocket the other 6 per cent.

If a bondholder with $1,000 or $100,000 of bonds which he was willing to deposit as security wanted to borrow $900 or $90,000 from any banker, corporation, or individual, he would have to pay 7 per cent. interest for it, just as I would have to do if I held and offered to deposit State bonds, railroad bonds, or other undoubted securities. Why should the Government, the people's banker, furnish him $900 or $90,000 on his securities at 1 per cent. interest per annum, when the money it furnishes is worth 7 per cent., and when it would not let me have a dollar though I might pile up other securities mountain high to secure the repayment of the loan?

The whole system is an odious monopoly, an unjust and iniquitous waste of public money and public credit to enrich the pets and partisans of the Administration, or to debauch political opponents who often become quasi radicals when they get to be national bankers.

Why should not 3 per cent. be charged for the money furnished? Is it not true that even then these men get the money they want either to loan or use in their business cheaper than they could obtain it anywhere else and cheaper than private bankers or other business men can get money? The figures I have furnished prove it; they are simple and easily understood.

Is it said that other taxes are imposed on national banks? I answer, none except what State banks and private bankers, who get no money from the Government, have to pay. Surely it is privilege enough, even after a tax is imposed equal to the value of the money furnished, that Congress grants them charters which protects their private property from responsibility for banking liabilities, makes them Government depositories, and exempts them from many burdens and responsibilities which other men engaged in like business, without Government patronage, have to bear.

However plausible the pretext may be under which our tariff-protected pets are enriched at public expense, it will hardly be pretended that banking is an infant industry that needs the fostering care of the Government. The men who engage in that are able to hold their own with the people. They are the hawks among the small birds; they need no guardians. They have, I fear, a majority of the members on this floor personally interested in defeating all efforts to impose just taxation upon them.

Perhaps it will be contended that the bank-notes furnished by the Government, not being legal tenders in payment of private debts, are not money in the ordinary sense, and therefore the banks ought not to pay the Government for its use what they might properly be required to do otherwise. For answer to all such suggestions I will ask the Clerk to read the portion of the letter I send to him which I have marked; it is from one of the ablest lawyers and best financiers in the country, Madison C. Johnson, esq., president of the Northern Bank of Kentucky; it expresses what I want to say much better than I can say it:

The most obvious truth in the whole matter is the very insufficient consideration received by the Government for the monopoly given to the national banks of the national currency, and for the guarantee of that currency by the Government. It is that guarantee which gives to the national-bank notes their uniform, universal, and even unquestioned currency and circulation as money. The national-bank notes are in substance the notes of the Government; practically as much so as the legal-tenders. It would be, consequently, just as proper for the Government to lend to the national banks legal-tenders at an interest of 1 per cent. per annum upon the security of the national bonds bearing 5 and 6 per cent. in gold as to lend as it does national-bank notes at that interest. The Government pays the national banks the same interest it pays to other holders of its bonds, but lends to those banks 90 per cent. in its guaranteed currency equal in value to legal-tenders at 1 per cent. in currency.

In addition the Government spends a large part of this 1 per cent. interest in the salaries and other expenses in watching over, examining into, and otherwise keeping in good credit these national banks, besides being at the whole of expense of the bank-notes.

It cannot be said that the reserves which the banks are required to keep are of any benefit to the Government or to the holder of the national-bank notes. The holder looks to the Government to redeem under its guarantee, without reference to the bank, its capital, or reserves.

It seems to me that these facts are so obvious that elaboration or attempt at elucidation would only obscure them.

Another fact is equally apparent, that our legal-tender notes could be made equal to gold in a day if Congress would only pass a law making them receivable for customs dues, and it is equally clear that even without that legislation they would long ago have been at par with gold but for legislation by Congress hostile to their appreciation, piling new burdens upon them and on the people for the benefit of the very men who are now so clamorous for a return to specie payments. I refer, of course, to the body of laws creating national banks and providing a national currency.

The effect of those laws is almost to double the circulation. Instead of being $400,000,000, as it would be without the bank-notes, it amounts to over $750,000,000, consisting of legal-tenders, national-bank notes, and postal currency, all of really equal value, and constituting a money of such perfectly uniform value that no one gives the slightest preference to one over the other in the transactions of business or in the receipt of money.

Substantially the national-bank notes are United States notes and substantially "legal-tenders," the faith of the Government being pledged to give legal-tenders for them if the national banks do not. Nearly doubling as they do the total circulation, they more than double the depreciation of that circulation below coin, rendering it at least doubly as difficult to bring our circulation to a par with gold.

If, instead of issuing these bank-notes to banks, the Government had issued its own Treasury notes payable on demand in greenbacks, placing those notes on the exact footing of national-bank notes, such as being payable and receivable for all public dues as legal tenders, and only different from greenbacks in not being legal tenders for private debts, there can be no doubt that these Treasury notes would circulate equally well with national-bank notes, and equally well as greenbacks. To issue such Treasury notes would no more violate any pledge, express or implied, of the Government not to issue more than four hundred millions of "legal-tenders," than is the issue of national-bank notes with the pledge of the Government to redeem them in greenbacks if not redeemed by the national banks.

The pledge of the Government to redeem such Treasury notes in greenbacks on demand would for the purpose of their circulation be equivalent to their actual redemption, and make them for purposes of circulation the equivalent of greenbacks just as national-bank notes now are their equivalent.

I consider the Government bound to take care that the circulation, that which constitutes the money of the country, is always sound and of uniform value everywhere. The community has no choice as to receiving whatever constitutes the circulating medium. Whatever it may be, they are compelled to receive it in exchange for their productions or their labor. It is otherwise as to all other parts of banking, which is simply an exchange of credits. Depositors can take care of themselves; borrowers can also. It is the general public, and especially the poor and ignorant, who cannot guard themselves against an unsound circulation. The General Government can give that sound circulation of uniform value at cheap rates, without partiality or favoritism, and can by proper penalties forbid any other. Having done this, the Government may well dismiss banking to the class of other pursuits to take care of itself.

Cheap, sound, and uniform currency is, as I have said, a special necessity to the poor and the humble. They hold most of it in some form or other; they are not complaining of it though its depreciation falls on them, while the bonds of the rich are made the special objects of Government protection. In the great transactions of commerce the check, the draft, the bill of exchange, the clearing-house certificates, and the other modern inventions to facilitate trade, reduce the use of currency to a very small percentage. If Government should forbid or tax these substitutes, the clamor for currency would be heard from all the contractionists. These devices are unknown to the laborer. At the market-house, in the retail shop, everywhere he has to pay for all he buys in currency; it is the money of retail, and is used now in that way to an extent proportionate to the magnitude of the country, its development, and its resources.

All railroad fares, express and post-office charges, as well as all wages for day labor and expenditures by the laborer, are paid in currency. Surely forty-three million of people covering such a continent as this, traversed by railroads, canals, stage-coaches, and street-cars, and filled with retail dealers, public and private, must need more currency to supply their wants than any like population in the small countries of the Old World, a majority of whose people never were twenty miles from the spot where they were born, and when they make such a journey almost invariably walk, and in a majority of cases receive as wages for their labor farm products for the support of their families; yet we have less than most of them, and half of what we have we get from national banks at exorbitant rates of interest, the Government having furnished it to them at 1 per cent. to enable them to plunder their neighbors.

Under our system Government has the exclusive power to furnish the people with money and regulate its value. It is the only species of property it can supply. The people get all else they possess as best they may. Men who undertake to interfere with this Government monopoly are sent to the penitentiary. A nickel worth one cent., when so ordered by the Government, is made five cents. A bond, greenback, bank-note, certificate of indebtedness, or other obligation, is worth whatever the Government says it shall be worth, and is receivable only for such dues or demands as the sovereign power prescribes. No set of bankers or bondholders can rightly intervene between the Government and the people in the supply of money made by its authority. Every citizen should obtain it on equal terms, and no Secretary of the Treasury nor any subordinate under him should have the right to say who should and who should not have it, when each offers equal security for its use. Congress might as well delegate its power to declare war and maintain armies to the Secretary of War as to delegate the control of the currency of the people to the Comptroller of the Currency and the national bankers. I had almost added, as well delegate its power to regulate commerce, and would have done so but for the fact that this House had in a moment of insane delusion transferred all its sovereign power over that great subject to a commission of nine partisans, for no other purpose that I can imagine than to enable the great railroad corporations to nominate or purchase five of them, as an easier and cheaper way to obtain authority to do what they please than the present somewhat complicated and expensive process of controlling the Congress of the United States and the Legislatures of thirty-seven States.

But I will not digress on that line further than to say that the grangers to whom they were pandering cannot be caught with such chaff, especially after the insincerity of the whole movement was so clearly developed by the refusal to remove the obstacle to cheap transportation at the Falls of the Ohio, in which fourteen States and their commerce are so immensely interested.

Returning to the question, why, I ask, should Congress fix a limit to banking or currency? If made free and limited only by the wants of the people, the demand will regulate the supply, as it does in all else. What is required at one season of the year is too much, or too little at another; if the highest amount required at any season is fixed and required to be kept at all seasons, gambling operations must supply the absence of legitimate business. The limited amount of fractional currency has never been all taken, because the demand never reached the limit of the supply. Men would not purchase bonds and exchange them for currency to an amount exceeding what they could make profitable, no matter what authority Congress gives. Up to that point I see no reason for limiting the use of money; the demand would regulate the amount.

With a fixed limit, combination can create scarcity by locking money up when it is most needed; panic and disaster follow. It would be impossible to do so if no limit is prescribed. Why should Congress arbitrarily determine, without knowledge of the wants of the people, or if you please with knowledge that at different seasons a different volume of currency is needed, to make a procrustean bed on which to torture a whole people? The true volume needed is the quantity business requires; let it contract or expand with the necessities of the time. Men's interest will furnish what we hear so much about—an elasticity, stability, and soundness, which a fixed quantity destroys.

Why, I ask, should Congress specially seek to encourage the business of the money-changers? These men produce nothing, add nothing to wealth; they toil not, neither do they spin. They live on the necessities or misfortunes of productive labor. They are the drones in the hive of industry. It might not be polite to say that they are the buzzards who batten and fatten on the corruptions of the body-politic. Moses, by divine authority, prohibited their business, and Christ drove them from the temple because under them it became a den of theives.

Whatever may be said as to money-lenders, one thing is clear: they need no protection, and should have no control of the money of the people.

I think if Mr. Calhoun was now alive he would advocate, in the present condition of the country, some such bill as I have offered. I judge so by reason of the following:

Mr. Calhoun, in his speech on the bill authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, September 19, 1839, said:

> It is, then, my impression that, in the present condition of the world, a paper currency in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its greater cheapness, lightless, and the facility of determining the amount. * * * * * * *
> It may throw some light on this subject to state that North Carolina, just after the Revolution, issued a large amount of paper, which was made receivable in dues to her. It was also made a legal tender, but which of course was not obligatory after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A large amount, say between four and five hundred thousand dollars, remained in circulation after that period, and continued to circulate for more than twenty years at par with gold and silver during the whole time, with no other advantage than being received in the revenue of the State, which was much less than $100,000 per annum. * * * * *
> No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank—more stable, more safe. Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions? Why should it not be safe in its own hands, while it shall be considered safe in the hands of eight hundred private institutions, scattered all over the country, and which have no other object but their own private profit, to increase which they almost constantly extend their business to the most dangerous extremes? And why should the community be compelled to give 6 per cent. discount for the Government credit blended with that of the banks, when the superior credit of the Government could be furnished separately, without discount, to the mutual advantage of the Government and the community? Why, let me ask, should the Government be exposed to such difficulties as the present, by mingling its credit with the banks, when it could be exempt from all such by using, by itself, its own safer credit? It is time the community, which has so deep an interest in a sound and cheap currency, and the equality of the laws between one portion of the country and another, should reflect seriously on these things, not for the purpose of oppressing any interest, but to correct gradually disorders of a dangerous character, which have insensibly, in the long course of years, without being perceived by any one, crept into the state. The question is not between credit and no credit, as some would have us believe, but in what form credit can best perform the functions of a sound and safe currency.
> Believing that there might be a sound and safe paper currency founded on the credit of the Government exclusively, I was desirous that those who are responsible and have the power should have availed themselves of the opportunity, &c.
> We are told the form I suggested is but a repetition of old continental money—a ghost that is ever conjured up by all who wish to give the banks an exclusive monopoly of Government credit. The assertion is not true; there is not the least analogy between them. The one was a promise to pay when there was no revenue, and the other a promise to receive in the dues of Government when there is abundant revenue.
> We are also told that there is no instance of a Government paper that did not depreciate. In reply, I affirm that there is none, assuming the form I propose, that ever did depreciate. Whenever a paper receivable in the dues of Government had anything like a fair trial, it has succeeded. Instance the case of North Carolina, referred to in my opening remarks. The drafts of the Treasury at this moment, with all their incumbrance, are nearly at par with gold and silver; and I might add the instance alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in which he admits that as soon as the excess of the issues of the Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky were reduced to the proper point its notes rose to par. The case of Russia might also be mentioned. In 1827 she had a fixed paper circulation, in the form of bank-notes, but which were inconvertible, of upward of $120,000,000, estimated in the metallic ruble, and which had for years remained without fluctuation, having nothing to sustain it but that it was received in the dues of the Government, and that, too, with a revenue of only about $90,000,000 annually. I speak on the authority of a respectable traveler. Other instances, no doubt, might be added, but it needs no such support.
> It has another and striking advantage over bank circulation, in its superior cheapness as well as greater stability and safety. Bank paper is cheap to those who make it; but dear, very dear to those who use it, fully as much so as gold and silver. It is the little cost of its manufacture, and the dear rates at which it is furnished to the community, which give the great profit to those who have a monopoly of the article. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the profit by the splendid palaces which we see under the name of banking-houses, and the vast fortunes which have been accumulated in this branch of business; all of which must ultimately be derived from the productive powers of the community, and of course adds so much to the cost of production. On the other hand, the credit of Government, while it would greatly facilitate its financial operations, would cost nothing, or next to nothing, both to it and the people, and of course would add nothing to the cost of production, which would give every branch of our industry, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, as far as its circulation might extend, great advantages both at home and abroad.

Later still, in his speech on the sub-treasury bill, Mr. Calhoun said:

> I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered—what heretofore I have but suggested—that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive it in all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold and silver at their option, would, to the extent that it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government; that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves; and that if, by possibility, it should depreciate, the loss would fall not on the people but on the Government itself; for the only effect of depreciation would be virtually to reduce the taxes, to prevent which the interest of the Government would be a sufficient guarantee. I shall not go into the discussion now, but on a suitable occasion I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I would be able to do more—to prove that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances, according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution; and that those at least who think that Congress can authorize the notes of private State corporations to be received in the public dues are estopped from denying its right to receive its own paper.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have no sympathy, and very little patience, with gentlemen who now seek to return to a gold basis. Their theories may be all right, and if the question was an original one whether we ought to adopt and maintain a gold or paper currency, being in a condition to do either without injury to our people, I would contend for the basis adopted by the commercial nations of the world; but all men know that we are not in that condition. A great debt was contracted during the war. Legislation was had under republican auspices which flooded the country with paper money, converted gold into an article of merchandise, and drove it not only from the currency but out of the country. Our imports now exceed our exports largely, so that no gold can be obtained from the sales of our surplus products to foreign nations. None but the bondholder can now obtain a gold dollar for any debt or demand, public or private, while the Government is pouring gold into the laps of the bondholders in the shape of interest on their bonds and in the payment of principal, to the whole amount of the customs duties, which have for five years averaged over $200,000,000 a year.

When those of us who think that the currency of the people should be sustained and made valuable by putting it to more extended uses proposed to pay one-half or one-third of the customs duties in legal-tender notes, every bondholder and monopolist raised the cry of "bad faith," and clamored that all the customs duties were forever pledged to them, and while they could not honestly absorb them they played the rôle of the dog in the manger, and would not allow the people to have the benefit even of what they could not use. Now they clamor for a return to specie payments, because they know that nobody but themselves either has or can possibly obtain gold, while they have, and will continue to obtain all that the Government can coerce from the tax-payers. Having obtained a monopoly of the gold and the bonds, and having by outrageous legislation, which, by a court constituted for the purpose, has been declared constitutional, deprived the people of gold, and not only forced them to take greenbacks for debts contracted to be paid in gold, but caused the Government to repudiate its legal-tender notes by refusing to receive them for customs duties, and to appropriate all the gold it can obtain to pay their own interest on their bonds, now they have the assurance to declare their own legalized offspring a bastard by pretending that the Constitution contains provisions which in time of war they have a right to construe one way, and in time of peace must be construed in another. Each construction, however, is intended to oppress the masses; in short every appliance is urged and every device is resorted to which these monopolists think will enrich them at the expense of the people. They know that every turn of the contracting screw is depreciating the value of the property of the debtor classes and adding to the purchasing power of their gold. If they succeed they will reduce to beggary and vassalage all those who were induced or compelled, by the legislation of ten years ago, to buy property at such prices as they could, with what those nabobs now call worthless greenbacks.

Paper money was good enough for the gold shriekers when it would buy United States bonds at par; it enabled them to take a first mortgage on all the property of the country for over $2,000,000,000, which they are now seeking to foreclose long before it is due, because they see the opportunity to extort more now from the toiling millions than they will probably be able to do at any future time. They suspect, rightly I trust, that a betrayed and impoverished people will no longer send to these halls Representatives and Senators who will violate their trusts and sacrifice all their interests to still further enrich a shoddy aristocracy based on banks and bonds.

If the gentlemen who are so clamorous for contraction would contract the debts which the great mass of the people owe instead of contracting their means of payment, they would afford substantial relief to the class which most needs protection; if in their desire to return to a just standard of values they would—as a court of equity would decree in private transactions between citizens—scale their own demands against the Government, so that we should only be required to pay them the gold value of the money they invested in our bonds at the time of the investment with legal interest thereon, we might agree to come to a general settlement of debts in gold, for there would be very little, if any, of our great national debt left; but while they are demanding the pound of flesh it is our duty to see that they do not draw the life-blood of their victims.

Expansion, which is held up as a bugbear to frighten the timid, will, if it hurts at all, only hurt those who cannot be seriously injured. Contraction ruins those who cannot rally from the blow inflicted.

I hope the day is not far distant when the wealth, and not as now the labor of the country, will be taxed to support the Government; when the incomes of the rich and the interest they are extorting from toil will bear their share of the public burdens. As a step in that direction, one which will produce $7,000,000 of revenue annually, I have asked the House to impose the tax of 3 instead of 1 per cent. per annum on the money loaned by the Government to the bond-holding bankers. Even that would enable us to give free coal, free salt, free matches, and free medicines to the people, and have more money in the Treasury than is now derived from all these sources combined, without doing any injustice to anybody. I would not be unjust to these gentlemen, but I see no reason for continuing the burdens which now oppress the whole people to enrich them at the public expense.

I have never been able to comprehend how upon principle—I readily understand how from interest—gentlemen who cry out against inflation when the legal-tender circulation is sought to be increased are entirely content to see the national-bank note circulation expanded.

I am opposed to the whole national-bank system as an unjust monopoly, and only propose to amend the bill of the committee by increasing the tax upon circulation as the best means I could think of to obtain some compensation for the vast privileges conferred on the bankers, if the system is to be perpetuated.

What the committee in their bill call free banking is to my mind in no sense free banking. Only the present bondholders can engage in it. If the bill becomes a law it extends the right, it is true, to all the present bondholders, but it stops with that class, and the Government has no power to authorize a single man outside of that circle to bank on any terms whatever. We are not proposing to increase our bonded debt. Of course all the bonds representing our present debt are held by private parties. What the committee call free banking gives not only the preference but the monopoly to these who have the bonds now outstanding to deposit for the currency.

If my bill, or the principles it asserts, prevails the Government can enable any man or set of men, whether they now hold bonds or not, who see fit to purchase the new low-interest bonds I propose to have issued, to become bankers. This would make banking not only free to all, but enable the Government without partiality and without placing one man at the mercy of another in procuring bonds to furnish them with currency and bonds supplied by the Government to the people at low rates. Not only could our present bonds bearing a high rate of interest be retired and many millions thus annually saved to the tax-payers, but the low rate of interest charged by the Government will necessarily reduce the rate which private individuals can charge, thus indirectly as well as directly releasing the industries of the people from the grasp of the money-changers.

The object of every representative of a free people should be to make the medium of exchange cheap and easily obtained when business requires it. Money is not property in any true sense; it is useless, except to dispose of; it never aids its owner till he parts with it; it is the yard-stick, the pound weight, the bushel measure. Government gives it all its value; it ought to supply, protect, and make it uniform. No class of men should be allowed to control it, or come between the Government and the people in the circulation of it. I regard the national-bank monopoly as a most unwarranted perversion of the powers and duties of Government in that regard; hence my opposition to the system.

If a fair vote can be had, I have no doubt the principles advocated by me will prevail, notwithstanding the power and the numbers of the national-bankers on this floor. One thing is certain, those who to enrich themselves, vote to oppress their constituents by voting millions of money into their own pockets at 1 per cent., to loan to the tax-payers at 8 and 10, will find their places occupied hereafter by men who will so legislate as to deprive them of their ill-gotten gains.

Poverty has brought reflection to the people and has sharpened all their senses; they can neither think nor look around them without feeling and seeing that the proceeds of their toil have in some way been transferred to the pockets of the bankers. Their palatial residences are everywhere; every prominent corner on every principal street in their cities is a bank Taxation is so arranged that the bonds and the incomes of the rich go free while half the daily wages of labor is taken away, under pretense of protecting it, by taxation on everything that is worn, used, or consumed, I had almost said that is seen, tasted, heard, touched, or smelled by the laborer and his family. He is looking into these things at last, and the result of his investigation will be to fill these Halls with a new and a very different order of men. He is beginning to see the folly of throwing his sweaty cap in the air and shouting for men who are secretly picking his pocket during his blind enthusiasm.

The claim of transcendent wisdom and profound statesmanship so long and so loudly claimed for the Administration because of the reduction of the national debt since 1869 has not only lost its charm but is now admitted to have been a scheme to plunder the people and enrich the bondholder. Over $40,000,000 has already been paid as premium in the purchase of the bonds redeemed, and the process is still going on. Even Senator SHERMAN had to admit that if half the effort had been made and half the money expended to make the legal-tenders good, they would be equal to gold to-day.

What makes the paper money of France, notwithstanding its volume, as good as gold? Simply because the state receives it for all taxes. How did North Carolina, Kentucky, and other States make the paper of their States as good as gold even when it was not a legal tender? Solely by receiving it for all taxes due to the State. Let these legal-tenders of the United States be made receivable for all taxes, customs as well as internal revenue, and they will be equal to gold at once. The bondholders know it; the gold-gamblers understand it; all the monopolists oppose it. Why, I ask, should they longer rule this Congress? They have obtained legislation whereby all the gold received goes into their pockets, and therefore demand specie payments.

Let us so legislate as to require the Government at least to take the only money we can get for the taxes we are required to pay, before we can land the goods we have to buy from other nations, in exchange for the products which we must sell to them, and the farmer will then be on something like terms of equality with the bondholder. So long as the people must buy gold from the bondholder to pay their debts to the Government, it is an insult to require them to curtail the value of the only money they can get to the gold standard, shrinking the value of everything they own, except the debts they owe to these gentlemen who have all the gold.

It is said that Mr. Greeley once went to Mr. Lincoln and urged him to cause specie payments to be resumed, showing how it could be done. Mr. Lincoln saw that the plan would soon exhaust the gold in the Treasury, which when gone he could not replace, and of course the scheme would prove a failure. He illustrated, as he could so aptly, by telling Mr. Greeley that in Illinois a terrible disease broke out among the dogs. Many of the most valuable died, all seemed likely to, when a Yankee came along, and for a reasonable fee agreed to cure them. His remedy was to cut their tails off as close to the body as possible. It worked like a charm. The dogs got well, and the Yankee got his money. All were delighted. But, unfortunately, the disease broke out again among them. The means of cure was gone. The operation could not be repeated, and the remaining dogs all died.

A like result, said Mr. Lincoln, would follow after the Treasury was once emptied; and he was wise enough not to attempt it. It would be as great folly now as then, until the bondholder will allow the people's money to be taken by the Government for all its taxes, just as his gold is taken.

I desire to say a few words before I close to gentlemen who represent the old and wealthy States of the North and East. When your press, your lecturers, your public meetings, and your combinations of protected wealth and monopoly undertake to threaten and denounce the West and the South because we do not do your bidding in regard to this question, calling us semi-barbarians and hinting strongly at resistance if we outvote you, your people make a great mistake. We can be led a great way, but we are hard to drive. Our people know their rights, and are not easily frightened. It will be a dark day for your people when politically you force a separation on the line of the Potomac and the Alleghanies.

There are empires yet almost untouched in the valley of the great Father of Waters. You know how few of the fifty Representatives added to this Congress came from your section. The disproportion will continue to increase with each succeeding census. In ten more years we will send full two-thirds of the Representatives to this Hall. These are facts it would be well to heed.

But waiving all these considerations, I ask, is it fair, is it fraternal, to seek to curtail our circulation now, when the six little New England States hold, in plain, palpable violation of law, and resist all efforts and demands to have its provisions complied with, almost three times as much banking capital as the fifteen States of the South and Southwest, and nearly as much as the whole twenty-five States of the South and West? The figures furnished by the Comptroller, showing the distribution of banking capital, are, in round numbers, as follows: The six New England States have $110,500,000; the fifteen Southern and Southwestern States have $38,160,000; the eleven Eastern States have $235,000,000; the twenty-six other States have $116,000,000.

This is the distribution made and maintained under a law which requires the banking capital to be distributed one-half according to population, and one-half according to wealth. Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia have a population exceeding by 316,770 that of the six New England States, as the last census shows, and have a wealth-producing power far greater, yet they have only $14,881,978 of banking capital; while New England has $110,500,000, and all her Representatives steadily resist all efforts to have the law complied with, and with one exception, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [General BUTLER,] demand from us further contraction of our circulation and means of payment.

I am bound to say for that gentleman, with whom I have antagonized as sharply in most things as with any member on this floor, that he has denounced the banking monopoly, the discriminating taxation in favor of wealth, and the repudiation of our national currency by refusing to receive it for customs dues, as unsparingly as any man in this House. Perhaps his course on that question may account for the hold he evidently has on the middle and poorer classes of his people. The following extract from his speech in 1869 may well be repeated, and the attention of the House and the country called to the truths contained in it. He said:

> Let me briefly sketch another illustration of this inequality of taxation which actually happened in my own neighborhood. There is a farmer owning a farm worth $10,000, upon which he does hard work enough every year to earn the support which he is able to give his family from his farm were he a mechanic. That farmer pays a tax to the State of $180, in various forms of State, county, and town taxes, to support schools and highways; and to the Government he pays, directly and indirectly, a tax of $200 more. His net returns from his farm are less than $1,000. He has a neighbor living near by him owning $100,000 of the bonds of the Government, on which he receives as interest $9,000 a year, on which no dollar of State, county, town, school, or highway taxes is paid. The farmer as he toils under the burning sun to earn the money to pay his taxes sees his neighbor riding luxuriously by in his carriage over the highway which farmers' taxes only have built and maintained. His neighbor's children and his own go to the same school supported by his taxes alone. He ponders, as he labors, upon the system of laws, which thus compels him to work to pay for the education of his wealthy neighbor's children, and as he reflects he will convince himself that he is suffering a bitter, burning wrong, and no argument will convince him to the contrary. If, then, you expect that farmer to vote for any man or party that retains a system of taxation which works such results, you expect what never has happened, what never will happen, and what ought never to happen in any civilized land. Change it how you will or can; but it must be changed. If you do not give relief by law the people will relieve themselves without you. The arguments by which you justify and sustain it, however specious or however sound, will fall unheeded on unwilling ears. You may cry out "good faith" till you are hoarse. You will be answered that there is no good faith which works injustice and wrong to a whole people. There is this alternative, no other; ponder it well—equalized taxation or repudiation.

Gentlemen, you have steadily refused to allow your bonds to be taxed, while all else bore the burden of supporting the Government; you have succeeded in passing laws to relieve your incomes, your manufactures, your accumulated wealth, and even the immense currency you illegally hold from taxation, while you load down our western products and industries till on distilled spirits, in which form alone we can transport our corn, and on our tobacco, we have to pay an annual tax to the Government of $86,000,000; largely more than double the amount of all the currency which the fifteen States of the South are, by the illegal extortion of the East, permitted to have.

You know that less than 7 per cent. of the bonds of the United States are owned west of the Alleghenies or south of the Potomac, so that it is impossible for us, as you have it now arranged, to get gold except at your price, with nearly all the gold interest paid to you and three-fourths of the amount of currency taken from us annually by the Government for internal taxes distributed by it among your people.

Is it fair, I repeat, to denounce us because we are opposed to being sold out of houses and homes to gratify your avarice?

It must not be forgotten that in 1868, when Congress with unparalleled unanimity ordered further contraction of the currency to cease, because of the oppression it was producing on the industries of the country, we had $1,030,000,000 in circulation. If it was unsafe and unwise to contract it below that point then, how is it possible, when all our wants, industries, and necessities have increased over 45 per cent. since that date, that we are to be denounced as inflationists when we ask for less than $800,000,000 of currency now?

Gentlemen, your avarice has overthrown your judgment. We will unite with you to make legal-tenders as good as gold, by requiring them to be received in payment of customs dues. I have a bill pending for that purpose now. We will cut down expenditures; we will do all that men can do to maintain honest and economical administration in all the affairs of Government. We will not ask you even to scale your bonds to the gold value of the greenbacks you bought them with; but you must excuse us if we decline to allow you to sell us out under the hammer, because at this time you happen to have all the gold in the country, and in that commodity we are at present poor.

We have all the elements and sources of wealth in abundance. We are able and willing to work. Against our will you forced us to take the paper which your laws made a legal tender. In spite of hostile and class legislation under which our people have suffered grievously and are still suffering—we are rapidly, even in the States of the South, building up our waste places and restoring our desolated homes. Thousands of our people lost all by a war which the people of the East never felt, or felt only as they fattened on our misfortunes, and we do not feel that we ought now to be deprived of or curtailed in our means of paying our debts, which, of course, are owing largely to the rich men of the East, men made rich by the very causes which made us poor.

The great cities along the Atlantic coast have been built up and are still being made more magnificent because their people are and have been our factors and brokers, our silent partners, and have taken all the profits. Your magnificent cities and your palatial homes have been built and paid for by our toil and our sweat. You may force us to seek other channels and other agents. The Mississippi and the Saint Lawrence can be made available means of reaching the sea with our products. Great lines of water transportation can be made to reach the ocean without touching your now great cities. Legislation had here may draw upon your wealth to construct them. We will ere long have the power to enact it whether you like it or not. It may be the part of wisdom to give us a chance now when we ask only what is reasonable, and to allow us the same right to determine what is best for our people that you claim to do for yours.

One thing is certain, abuse will not forward your views, hard words will not change votes. Whenever the western Representatives are satisfied that they are wrong they will put themselves right. Till they are, they will pursue the course which in their judgment will best promote the interest of the people they represent. I may be compelled, as I cannot do what I want, to vote for some such bill as the Senate has sent us, or as the committee presents, perpetuating the national-banking system. I shall do it with great reluctance, and only after I have made all the efforts in my power to tax them to the full value of the money furnished to them by the Government.

Mr. RANDALL obtained the floor.

DELTA OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. LAMAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 84) to appoint a commission to examine into the subject of reclaiming the delta of the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on the Mississippi Levees, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) in relation to currency and free banking.

Mr. MAYNARD. My associate on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] has fifteen minutes of his own time which I understand he desires to use himself. Before my colleague proceeds, I desire to make this proposition to the House: that if, after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has occupied his fifteen minutes, the debate by general consent can be permitted to go on in ten-minute speeches until after half-past three o'clock to-morrow, I will then call the previous question. If that arrangement cannot be made, I shall under the pressure brought for a vote attempt to have the previous question seconded when the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets through.

Mr. TYNER. On that understanding on the part of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] I shall object to his proposition, for the purpose of bringing the House to a vote to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, who has charge of this bill, desires to submit this proposition: The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes remaining of his hour. And the chairman of the committee proposes that after his colleague shall have concluded, the debate be continued in speeches of ten minutes each until half-past three o'clock to-morrow, when he will demand the previous question. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] to object to that arrangement.

Mr. TYNER. I have objected on the understanding that the gentleman from Tennessee would demand the previous question immediately after the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall conclude his remarks. If that is the understanding in regard to the course he proposes the House shall take, then I will object to the ten-minute debate in order to bring the House to a vote to-night. But if it is the gentleman's intention to let the debate run in hour speeches, then I will withdraw my objection; my purpose being to get the House to a vote as speedily as possible.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will explain the theory on which I made the proposition. From the temper of the House and the evident desire to dispose of this question it is manifest that the House will become exceedingly impatient if every gentleman who has intimated a wish to be heard on this question shall consume an hour. The proposition I have made, that after the gentleman from Pennsylvania is through the debate be continued in ten-minute speeches until half-past three o'clock to-morrow, will give an opportunity to every gentleman who has placed his name on the Speaker's list, and to every gentleman who has spoken to me privately, to be heard, not in an argument, to be sure, but in a statement—for we all understand what ten-minute speeches are—and it is to accommodate, I believe, every gentleman who has intimated a wish to be heard to that extent that I made the proposition.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say that if the gentleman from Tennessee does not intend to allow any amendments to be offered to the bill, I see no use myself in a ten-minute debate. If the temper of the House indicates anything, as we have had it exhibited to-day, it indicates a desire to test the sense of the House on some amendments to the bill. I regard some portions of the bill as operating with unnecessary hardship on the region of country I represent; and I want at least the opportunity, if no more time for lengthened debate is allowed, to ask the attention of the House for five minutes to the amendments which I think are called for. If the previous question is to be demanded and the gentleman wishes to take the sense of the House on this bill without amendment, I see no reason why he should not do it to-night as well as next week.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee proposes to allow a vote on amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have said nothing about amendments. I have merely proposed to bring the debate to a conclusion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was about to suggest that if the gentleman proposes to allow amendments he should allow ten minutes debate on each amendment by the gentleman offering it and then call the previous question at once.

Mr. TREMAIN. It seems to me, whether amendments are allowed or not, that it is no more than fair to gentlemen who desire to put themselves right on the record on this proposition, the most important measure before Congress, that they should have at least ten minutes for that purpose. The eleven members of this committee who had preference under the rules of this House have uniformly, I believe, spoken in favor of this scheme. The debate has been substantially monopolized by gentlemen on that side of the question, and no doubt they are in harmony with a majority of this House; but I do ask whether it is not fair, whether it is not just and proper, that gentlemen who regard this bill and this whole scheme of inflation as dangerous in the extreme should at least be permitted to utter a protest in some form, and I wish that the gentleman who is chairman of the committeee, instead of saying ten minutes, would allow at least fifteen minutes. In ten minutes one can scarcely do more than record his purpose as to the vote. The State of New York has only been heard through one of her members on this floor.

Several MEMBERS. That is a mistake.

Mr. TREMAIN. No matter how that may be, at all events the debate has been substantially on one side, and I ask whether it is not fair to the minority of this House that they should at least have an opportunity to be heard? "Strike, but hear," is all we ask.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would remind the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] that his colleague who occupies the seat where he now stands [Mr. MELLISH] has been heard on this question several times.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to know if I have not the floor for the purpose of moving to adjourn, and if not, by what right any other gentleman claims it?

The SPEAKER. By the right of discussing the pending measure. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, is occupying the floor; but has yielded in order that some arrangement might be made about the future conduct of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I did not understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had taken the floor at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is merely allowing some conference to be had to see if an agreement cannot be made as to the disposition of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. May I ask if the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been running for the last eight or ten minutes?

The SPEAKER. It has, if the gentleman insists on it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] will withdraw his objection. A ten-minute debate would oblige a number of gentlemen who desire to place themselves on the record.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Would it be in order to have Governor Dix's message read?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will make another proposition. If gentlemen are willing to come here to-night I will ask for an evening session, and we will continue the discussion then; and at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] I will modify my proposition so as to propose that the discussion to-night shall be in fifteen-minute speeches; no vote to be taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that there may be a session this evening for the purpose of discussing this bill, no vote to be taken thereon and no other business to be transacted, and the speeches to be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. TYNER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee indicate what time to-morrow he will ask for a vote?

Mr. MAYNARD. I have stated that if we could come to an agreement like that which I indicated I would extend the discussion until half-past three o'clock to-morrow, and that otherwise I would make no agreement on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the arrangement suggested by the gentleman for an evening session will continue during to-morrow's session from half-past one until half-past three?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman suggests that the evening session and the session of to-morrow from half-past one until half-past three be devoted to the discussion of this bill in fifteen-minute speeches, intimating that at half-past three o'clock he will call the previous question.

Mr. TYNER. That involves the consumption of only two hours in debate to-morrow, and I therefore will not object.

Mr. SHANKS. I object, if the speeches are to be fifteen minutes long to-morrow. A man who cannot say what he knows about this question in five minutes ought not to say anything.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not require that a gentleman shall give a reason for his objection.

Mr. SHANKS. I will double the time, and agree to ten-minute speeches.

Mr. MAYNARD. The House doubtless recollects the fable of the man who was going to market, accompanied by his son, with a certain animal; the rest of it will be remembered. I do not propose to make any further proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition again so that the House may understand what is objected to and what is not objected to. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that there shall be a session this evening, at half-past seven o'clock, which shall be devoted entirely to the discussion of the pending bill in fifteen-minute speeches, no vote to be taken thereon and no other business to be transacted, and that to-morrow, when the bill comes up under the order at half-past one o'clock, the discussion shall be continued, also in speeches of fifteen minutes, until half-past three, when he will ask the House to second the demand for the previous question. It will then be for the House to determine, of course, whether they will second that demand, and that will bring up the question whether the bill shall be open for amendments or substitutes. The gentleman having charge of the bill has a right to frame his own proposition and to ask the House to agree thereto. If there be no objection to that arrangement the Chair will consider it agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The House, under the order just made, will meet this evening at half-past seven o'clock for discussion of the pending bill, no other business whatever to be transacted, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MCDILL] will be in the chair, as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the House do now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. MCDILL, of Wisconsin, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the session this evening will be for debate only, in speeches not to exceed fifteen minutes each, upon the bill to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr BUNDY. I do not know really whether I want to make a speech or not.

Mr. MYERS. I have no doubt there are other gentlemen who are ready to speak.

Mr. BUNDY. There is only one part of the bill to which I wish to call attention, and I suppose I can do that in fifteen minutes, and may as well do it now as at any other time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Now is the accepted time.

Mr. BUNDY. I refer to that part of the bill which looks to a resumption of specie payments by the force of law. I know that those of us who are in favor of a proper amount of currency are stigmatized by the name of "inflationists." We do not accept that designation at all. As I understand it, at least so far as I am concerned and those who sympathize with me, we simply want a sufficient quantity of circulating medium to do the ordinary business of the country; and whatever that may be in amount, we want to have it made just as good as it is possible to make it.

It is also reported that we are in favor of inflation and against what they call resumption of specie payments. I do not understand that to be so. The only matter of difference between us, between those who favor resumption in their way and we in ours is this: We think that the best mode, and perhaps the speediest mode of getting to specie payments is through a proper expansion of the currency, so as to start off the business and the industries of the country; theirs is by contraction and the consequent destruction of the business of the country.

Now the reason why I am opposed to having anything in this bill that provides a time, I do not care when that time is fixed, for a forced resumption of specie payments, is because that at once makes the western country and the whole business of the West tributary to the East. If we can get at specie payments by the natural order of things, through the natural course of business, so that the paper currency comes up in value to gold, we will then have a resumption that will be worth something to the whole country.

Now I undertake to say, and I believe I am right in saying, that the gentlemen in the East, in New York especially, if you please, who are clamoring so loudly for specie payment, would not accept it through our plan. If we had the power to-day to tender them specie payment, if we had the power to bring up the circulating medium of the country, the paper currency, to gold, they would not be satisfied with it. If every dollar of paper was equal to a dollar in gold, without enforced resumption, they would not be satisfied with it. And why?

Some of us are old enough to remember the days of 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860. In Ohio from 1856 to 1860 we had resumption of specie payments. With that resumption we had perhaps the most perfect system of carpet-bagging that has ever been seen in this country, not even excepting the Southern States. And with that we also had this: every person who got money at our banks, upon business or accommodation paper, was compelled to pay for it, in addition to the interest allowed by law, the cost of transporting gold from Ohio to New York City. That was a condition precedent to any bank accommodation. The cost of that transportation, including the charges of the middle-men, was about 1 per cent.; and 1 per cent. on a ninety days' discount was equal to 4 per cent. per annum. The reason we had to do that was because we had what was then called specie payments enforced by law.

Now, if we can have a resumption of specie payments under the plan that I have indicated, our paper currency would be just as good as it is now in paying debts in all parts of the country. Therefore the New York broker could not say to the western merchant, "Although your paper is good, yet because the law provides that you shall pay specie, you must pay the cost of transporting specie from the West to New York City." That is the reason why I do not wish to have forced resumption of specie payments by law; and I hope that before we get done voting upon this bill we will have it put in some such form that there shall not be forced resumption of specie payments by law.

Mr. FIELD. That is right.

Mr. BUNDY. Our currency now, whatever may have been said of it by gentlemen here, is the best currency this country ever had. There has been less fluctuation in prices while it has been a medium of exchange than there was in the best days of specie payments. And allow me to say that that constitutes the objection that these men have to it—it is because they cannot shave us every time we go to pay a debt in bank in the East or in the West.

Why, sir, I remember that in those days of specie payments I was once at Pittsburgh, and they would not take their own paper in payment of my hotel bill because Ohio money was worth then about 3 per cent. premium.

We have been characterized here as those who are heavily laden with articles of merchandise of some description and that we want to unload. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] a very fair-minded man indeed, made that charge directly to-day, that because we are in favor of a proper increase of the currency, that which the business wants of the country indicate, we want to speculate upon that which we have to sell. Why, Mr. Speaker, I hope no gentleman here legislates upon any such theory as that. I hope no one takes into account any personal advantages that are to accrue to him because of any legislation we may accomplish here. But it is not true that the speculators in produce, the speculators in substances to be sold in the market, are responsible in this matter. Why, Mr. Speaker, the resumptionists in the East are the very men that have brought this difficulty upon us. The long list of names that were sent us (and I presume I have a copy in my desk) comprised those Wall street men, those men who say, "We do not wants any more paper money." They are the men who undertook to do a pretty large thing, and they to-day are asking us to help them to unload. They undertook to corner all the currency of the country and hold it until this Congress should be compelled by the straitened circumstances of the country to resume specie payments. They are asking us now to help them unload; they want action immediately.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to characterize the attitude of any gentleman here on this question as being unworthy of his position in this House. I do not know that we are obnoxious to the charge they make against us, that we want an indefinite inflation of irredeemable currency. We do not ask any such thing. But we do ask that the people of this country shall be the judges of their own matters concerning them personally. We have never yet delegated all these subjects to a comparatively few gentlemen in the eastern part of the country. Our theory is that the people of this country are capable of taking care of themselves. We take it for granted that they are until we come to this question of finances, and the very moment you come to that we are to be told here that the people have not the ordinary discretion to take care of their own interests; that if we give them an opportunity to establish a banking system which shall be free, they are going to lose all their discretion and adopt such a system, and extend it in such a way that it will break down of its own weight.

I take it the people will do no such thing. I take it that we are just as much interested as they in having a currency that shall be good, of uniform value all over the country, that shall approximate as nearly as possible to the precious metals; and I take it that the people of the West have just as much sense, as much judgment, as much virtue, as much honesty in managing their financial matters as those gentlemen in the East have. Are we afraid to trust the people on any other subject? It seems we are not. But the very moment we come to this subject, it seems we are not to be trusted at all; we cannot be trusted in Ohio or Illinois or Indiana or anywhere else with saying how much money we want to do our business with and what the quality of that money shall be.

Now, I do not know but that I have said all I want to say about this matter. I will add, however, that a good many comparisons which have been instituted here are, it seems to me, very far-fetched. I will allude to one or two. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] paraded this afternoon a quantity of the old continental money, to show the dangerous tendency of the times in regard to our greenbacks and our national-bank notes. Why, Mr. Speaker, is there any parallel between the two cases? Gentlemen have also referred to the French assignats. But they were founded upon what? Upon nothing, as it turned out. They had no government support, as our currency has. They were founded upon the confiscation of the property of the church, and the property of the emigrant nobles. Not only that, but the government that issued those obligations undertook to confiscate man of his immortality, the universe of its God.

[Mr. HYDE obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks upon the pending bill.] (See Appendix.)

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, the subject of the currency seems to be the all-absorbing theme at the present time; it has been well said the country is looking to Congress for relief; but there is a great variety of opinions in regard to the duty of Congress upon this question, but judging from the vote in this House on the legalizing of the $44,000,000 of United States notes we may conclude that the cry for more paper money will prevail. Now, if we are to have more currency, in my judgment it should be of national-bank notes instead of legal-tenders, for I do not think we ought to break any pledges of the Government; and the act of June 30, 1864, which authorizes the issue of $200,000,000 Treasury notes, contains this provision:

> Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan.

This temporary loan spoken of was redeemed, so that $400,000,000 was the limit. Soon after this the Secretary of the Treasury commenced canceling and retiring the legal-tenders, but Congress, evidently fearing he might be contracting too fast, passed the act of April 17, 1866, which provided:

> That of the United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

The Secretary of the Treasury had this authority until February 4, 1868, when it was suspended, he having retired $44,000,000.

Now, if these notes were retired and canceled, was not this the end of them? If this language means anything it must mean this. There was no necessity of passing this act of April 17, 1866, if it simply meant that the Secretary of the Treasury might be authorized to cancel these notes and issue new notes instead, for I doubt not he had been so doing before this act was passed.

If this House thought the Secretary of the Treasury had the authority to reissue these notes which had been canceled and retired for about six years, why were we called upon to pass an act to legalize this reissue?

I voted, reluctantly, to legalize the reissue of $26,000,000 United States notes, because this amount had already been paid out. I would however have much preferred that the Secretary of the Treasury should have been authorized to sell bonds, if necessary, and retired the amount of notes which he had felt compelled to reissue during the panic through which we have passed.

I could not vote to increase the circulation of the United States

notes to $400,000,000, for that is going from instead of toward specie payments; but if we must have more currency, I prefer that we pass a free-banking law and give all a fair chance; indeed, I do not object to free banking, if we provide for redemption in New York City and for a proper reduction of the United States notes.

There is no mystery in banking; it is like any other business, simply a matter of debit and credit. If banking associations make promises to pay, they should pay them promptly according to agreement, just the same as business men are required to pay their notes, and when they stop paying they should be treated as failures. In short, if banks will pay their debts it is all we can ask of them. But I do object to the unlimited issue of paper money, without any wholesome restrictions requiring the redemption of the same. We have at this time more legal-tenders in circulation than national-bank notes, and one class of these notes is no better than the other; therefore the paying of a bank-note by exchanging it for a legal-tender note is like the man who paid his obligation by giving his note therefor, and then thanking God he had paid that debt!

For the purpose of improving this bill I propose the following amendment:

At the end of section 2 add the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to fund United States notes, known as legal tenders, into 5 per cent. bonds to an amount equal to three-fourths of the amount of the increase of the national-bank circulation, and shall cancel and destroy said United States notes.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment provides for funding an amount of legal-tenders equal to 75 per cent. of the increase of the national-bank circulation into a 5 per cent. bond, known as the ten-forty bonds, namely: for every $4,000,000 of additional bank-notes issued, $3,000,000 of United States notes, known as legal-tenders, are to be funded, canceled and retired.

This does not propose to contract but rather to increase the volume of circulation; but at the same time it will prepare the way for resumption of specie payments, it may be slowly, but it will be surely a step in that direction, and I think all will admit that the amount of United States notes must be reduced before the Government can resume specie payments.

This process will not interrupt the business of the country, because it gives increased facilities; this House having already added $44,000,000 to the volume of legal-tenders, which, with the increase of national-bank currency over the proposed destruction of legal-tenders, will probably increase the currency of the country some sixty to seventy million dollars within one year, which will surely be ample for the business wants of the country. This amount is upon the expectation of an increase of the national-bank circulation, say sixty-four millions the first year, and a reduction of legal-tenders of $48,000,000, which transaction will increase the volume of the currency $16,000,000, in addition to the aforesaid $44,000,000 of legal-tenders; so that at the end of the year we would have out of legal-tenders $352,000,000 and national-bank notes $418,000,000, making $770,000,000, besides the $48,000,000 of fractional currency, which, added, makes $818,000,000 in circulation. It seems to me this amount of currency ought to be sufficient to satisfy the demand for more currency, and the amount will continue to increase as the demand for banks increase, but the legal-tenders will decrease three-fourths as much as the bank-notes increase.

While I do not think we need any increase of the currency, I am willing to vote for the bill with this provision, because I think we will, as I said before, be moving in the direction of specie payments, and it will give elasticity to our currency and satisfy the cry of the masses for more money,

These 5 per cent. bonds would sell to-day above par in gold, or say 114 in legal-tenders, and if the Government should be prepared to retire them within fourteen years it would cost less than 4 per cent. interest; while the taxes of the banks paid the Government on circulation and deposits would be more than 2 per cent. on the amount of the circulation, as will be seen by the following table taken from the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency:

The national banks, prior to May 1, 1871, paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a license or special tax of $2 on each $1,000 of capital, and an income tax on net earnings to December 31, 1871. The special or license tax from May 1, 1864, to May 1, 1871, amounted to $5,322,688.43; the income tax from March 1, 1869, to September 1, 1871, amounted to $5,539,289.17. The national banks also pay the following taxes to the Treasurer of the United States: One per cent. annually on circulation outstanding; ½ of 1 per cent. annually upon deposits, and ¼ of 1 per cent. annually upon capital not invested in United States bonds. These taxes are payable semi-annually.

The following table exhibits the amount of taxes collected by the Treasurer annually from the organization of the system to January 1, 1873:

Year.	Circulation.	Deposits.	Capital.	Aggregate.
1864	$287,740 45	$412,953 99	$55,631 63	$756,326 07
1865	1,371,170 52	2,106,480 74	316,829 01	3,794,480 27
1866	2,638,396 35	2,668,674 72	350,545 29	5,657,616 36
1867	2,934,685 63	2,518,780 65	314,899 42	5,768,365 70
1868	2,955,394 60	2,657,235 91	299,126 21	5,911,756 72
1869	2,956,168 02	2,525,571 87	349,147 97	5,830,887 86
1870	2,941,381 51	2,694,480 26	381,598 67	6,017,460 34
1871	3,092,797 56	3,027,767 58	385,247 07	6,505,812 21
1872	3,282,597 46	3,144,839 45	418,883 75	6,846,320 66
Totals	22,460,332 00	21,756,785 17	2,871,909 02	47,089,026 19

This tabular statement shows that the national banks have paid taxes to the Treasurer of the United States, without any expense for collection, on their circulation, deposits, and capital, from the year 1864 to January 1, 1873, the sum of $47,089,026.19. It will also be seen by this table that the banks paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prior to May 1, 1871, the sum of $10,861,977.60 for license and income tax, making the handsome sum of $57,951,003.79 paid by the banks to the Government since their organization.

Mr. FIELD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. FIELD. For what did the national banks pay this large amount of money?

Mr. PENDLETON. They paid it as taxation in the same way as the gentleman paid his tax on manufactures or whatever other business he may have been engaged in.

Mr. FIELD. Did the banks receive anything in return?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir; banks continue to pay their taxes semi-annually.

Mr. FIELD. No benefits?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir.

Mr. FIELD. Then I do not see why they should have paid this taxation.

Mr. PENDLETON. Did not the gentleman pay his taxes? And did he receive any benefit from paying those taxes?

Mr. FIELD. I think I did.

Mr. PENDLETON. What benefit?

Mr. FIELD. I enjoyed the benefit of the protection of the Government.

Mr. PENDLETON. Would not the gentleman have enjoyed that benefit without paying taxes?

Mr. FIELD. Did not the banks get something more than anybody else?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir.

Mr. FIELD. That is all.

Mr. PENDLETON. The banks have received franchises.

Mr. FIELD. O, have they?

Mr. PENDLETON. But not for the purpose of paying taxes.

Mr. FIELD. Well, the banks do receive franchises?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly they do.

Mr. FIELD. That is the point I wanted to bring out.

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir; the banks have received the franchise of being enabled to do business for twenty years. This was given to them by the law.

And yet there are gentlemen on this floor who want to increase the tax of the banks until they will be compelled to surrender their franchises, and yield their business to private bankers, in some places; in the larger cities and towns they could live and prosper without issuing bills, but in the smaller towns and villages they would be obliged to wind up their business, for a country bank without circulation cannot do a profitable business.

To show how profitable these banks have been to their stockholders, I insert another extract and tabular statement from the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, as follows:

The national banks are required by the act of March 3, 1869, to make semi-annual returns to this office of their dividends and earnings. From these returns the following table has been compiled, exhibiting the aggregate capital and surplus, total dividends, and total earnings of the national banks, with the ratio of dividends to capital, dividends to capital and surplus, and earnings to capital and surplus for each half-year, commencing March 1, 1869, and ending September 1, 1873:

From the foregoing statement I cannot see the propriety of increasing the taxes of the national banks, for out of these dividends, in most cases, the local taxes have to be paid. Stockholders of banks ought to get larger returns from bank stock than from mortgages, for their is a greater risk.

Mr. Speaker, I introduced a bill some time since to provide for the repeal of the sixth section of the act of July 12, 1870, which provides for transferring national-bank circulation from the East to the West and South.

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill repeals that section.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am glad to hear it.

Much has been said against the eastern banks for holding more currency than their proportion. They took up this currency not until they were urged to do so by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. S. P. Chase, and not until the West and South neglected to take it, and our banks expected to retain for twenty years as the law provided. Almost every bank that was organized became an agent to sell the bonds and seven-thirty notes for the Government, and these banks sold more than their proportion, I presume, of those securities; but, nevertheless, they sold no more than the Secretary of the Treasury wanted them to sell. Nor did they take any more of the circulation than he was willing to furnish.

I have incorporated as a part of my remarks an extract from the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency showing the difficulties of transferring this currency. He says:

These requisitions will be made upon the banks located in the following States and cities:

Four in the city of New York	$5,018,000
Thirty-seven in the city of Boston	13,320,000
Twenty-one in the State of Massachusetts	2,659,000
Seventeen in the city of Providence	2,818,000
Fifteen in the State of Connecticut	1,185,000

This will reduce to $1,000,000 the circulation of all banks in the city of New York having an excess over that amount, and the circulation of all banks in Massachusetts and Rhode Island to $300,000. If these banks do not return the amount of circulation within one year after the requisition is made upon them, it is made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to sell at public auction, upon twenty days' notice, the bonds deposited by such associations as security for said circulation equal in amount to the circulation to be withdrawn, and not returned in compliance with the requisition. With the proceeds of the bonds the Comptroller is required to redeem the notes of these banking associations as they come into the Treasury. The notes of these banks are so scattered through the whole country that it will be impracticable for them to return their circulation without an expense not contemplated by the act; and it will, therefore, be for the interest of the banks to provide the Comptroller of the Currency with the requisite amount of legal-tender notes with which to redeem their circulation as it comes into the Treasury. To this extent the act may be executed; but the notes to be redeemed will not come to the Treasury for redemption to any considerable amount, and therefore but a small proportion of the twenty-five millions will be placed at the disposal of the Comptroller for redistribution to the banks of the South and West. The result will, therefore, be great embarrassment to the banks to whom the currency has already been issued, without providing any relief for organizations elsewhere, as contemplated by the act. The Comptroller, therefore, repeats the recommendation contained in his previous report, that section 6 of the act of July 12, 1870, be repealed, and that twenty-five millions additional circulation be authorized to be issued and distributed among the States, as heretofore provided.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see what will be the effect of withdrawing $25,000,000 currency from the East.

This $25,000,000, less 15 per cent. reserve deducted, namely, $3,750,000, leaves $21,250,000 loanable funds for business interests at the East from this circulation. Let us look at the other side:

These banks will have to furnish in legal-tenders $25,000,000 to the Comptroller, which will call for $27,778,000 bonds; these will sell in market on an average for $117 per $100—some being 5 per cent. and some 6 per cent. bonds—which would amount to $32,500,000. Therefore we see that these banks will have to withdraw from the circulation of the country $25,000,000 of legal-tenders and deposit for their bonds, and then take $32,500,000 of legal-tenders from New York City, where they would sell their bonds and replace the $25,000,000 that was withdrawn, thereby giving them $7,500,000 more capital. To this we will add the amount of reserve, namely, $3,750,000, which will make $11,250,000 more working capital. In other words, these banks, with their bank circulation, before withdrawal, could loan from it, as before shown, $21,250,000. After withdrawal they can loan $32,500,000 to their customers, being more than 50 per cent. increase. Surely this will be no damage to their patrons, but it would be a contraction of the currency of the whole country from the time the $25,000,000 of legal-tenders were deposited in the United States Treasury until the bank circulation could be called in and reissued to banks in the West and South. The time it would take to accomplish this result we have no means of ascertaining, but I doubt if it can be done within five years at least.

From the foregoing we can see that the withdrawal of this currency will interrupt the business of the East during the time they are changing the legal-tenders from the East to the Treasury and obtaining the bonds and converting the same into legal-tenders; also, that the banks will lose the profit on this circulation, say about 2 per cent. per annum. At the same time, as I have shown, the banks will be able to increase their loans to their customers.

I trust this bill may be so amended as to remove some other objections which my time will not allow me to point out.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I do not know I should have attempted to speak on the important question before the House if it had not been for the remarks made this afternoon by my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] I understood him to say the people of the section of the country he represented are in favor of contraction; that they do not desire any more currency, but are in favor of some process by which specie payments shall speedily be resumed. I come from a section of Pennsylvania where the people are largely engaged in the mining of coal and in the manufacture of iron. I was home but a few days ago, and while there I did not find a single operator in coal-mining or a single manager of furnaces, rolling-mills, factories, or machine-shops who did not say to me, "Give us more currency, because during the last five years with the currency the country had we were prosperous; we were developing our mines and building up our furnaces and rolling-mills and extending railroads." The laborers say the same thing; that before the war, when they were paid at the end of the month, they had eight dollars, but now they have twenty-two dollars above current expenses, and that they can buy more goods and do more for their families with twenty-two dollars in currency than with eight dollars of specie before the war. That is what the laboring men say in the section of the country from which I come.

And this matter of coal, Mr. Speaker, is not an unimportant item in Pennsylvania. In the three counties adjoining the one where I live there are mined twenty-two million tons of anthracite coal every year, which, when put into New York and Philadelphia, and to the furnaces, rolling-mills, &c., is worth five dollars a ton and upward, thus requiring over $100,000,000 annually to move this coal to market.

But it was not on that particular point I wished to speak. Specie payment of course is desirable. Everybody looks forward to the day when specie payments will be resumed. But can we resume specie payments by legislative enactments? Can you pass laws by which you can put gold and silver into the pockets of the people, except as you pass protective laws to employ the labor of the country in order to develop the mines of the country and build up furnaces and other establishments that will put the raw material of the earth into marketable form?

There are at this time in my judgment three insuperable objections to specie payments. The first is that we have not gold enough in the country to-day; the next is that we are importing more than we are exporting; and, in the third place, because we are paying $125,000,000 in gold to Europe upon our bonded indebtedness, I mean upon the bonded indebtedness of the United States as well as of our various corporations.

England and Germany hold the best of our bonded securities, that is, those bonds which pay the highest rate of interest. When you get your bonds home, we will then be on the way to specie payments. When you can get the balance of trade in favor of the United States, specie payments will soon follow, and without any legislation at all.

But we are told by gentlemen that England is paying specie; that France also is paying specie although France has just emerged from a great and exhaustive war. They say that England, Germany, and France are paying specie, and why cannot we do the same thing in this country? In the first place, I answer that, while the debt of England is as great as that of this country, it is held by the English people. The people of England hold the bonds or consols of England, and the interest paid on that indebtedness is paid at home. And the same is true in regard to Germany. Instead of our holding the bonded indebtedness of the nation ourselves, one-half of it is held abroad; and all the great railroad enterprises and developments which have been built up in this country during the last ten or fifteen years have been built mainly with capital borrowed in Europe.

These are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why, in my judgment, we cannot now resume specie payments. Make the country prosperous; develop our great agricultural regions; open up the coal mines; cultivate the cotton-fields; encourage in fact all the vast industries of this country; build up wealth; fill our country with a busy population, and then there will be no trouble about specie payments.

I desire to say further, Mr. Speaker, we have not the amount of money England has with which to resume specie payments; we have neither the same amount in the aggregate nor per capita. And I have a statement here to which I call attention:

Total currency volume of the United States	$869,000,000
Less gold and paper reserves	200,000,000
Total actual circulation	669,000,000
Circulation per capita, $16.72.
Total currency volume of England	$884,943,000
Less reserves	112,259,000
Total actual circulation	772,684,000
Circulation per capita, $24.28.
Total currency volume of Germany	$1,296,000,000
Less reserve	205,000,000
Total actual circulation	1,091,000,000
Circulation per capita, $26.80.
Total currency volume of France	$1,650,000,000
Less gold and silver reserve in bank	540,000,000
Total actual circulation	1,250,000,000

It will be seen from this statement that while the United States has $869,000,000 of volume of currency circulation, England has $884,000,000. We have sixteen dollars and a fraction per capita; England has twenty-four dollars, Germany has twenty-six dollars, and France has thirty-four dollars. Now, if we had currency in the United States equal to what England has per capita, or Germany, or France, we would have, according to the per capita of England, $971,000,000 in currency; or if we had what France has per capita, we would have $1,488,000,000; or if we had what Germany has we would have $1,072,000,000.

Now, does anybody pretend to say that a country new and vigorous, such as this is, and desiring to be developed, does not need more money than England or Germany or France? We have a greater area of territory. We have seventy-six thousand miles of railroad, while England has but fourteen thousand miles. As I have said, we are largely indebted for our railroads and public improvements to Europe, while England has paid for the whole of hers. Now, is it possible that a new country, which must be built up in every direction, does not need more money than an old country, whose houses and railroads and public improvements are almost finished?

If you have not gold enough to do the business of the country, what do you intend to do the business of the country with? What better can you get than the promises of a government; because a government note is a mortgage upon every farm and upon every workshop in the country, and the people believe that the government will at last pay these promises? Because of the waste and prostration which a great and wonderful war produced, this country for the time being was and is crippled. The Government, however, is lending its credit to the people that its great resources may be developed. That is the idea which a great many men in Pennsylvania and in other portions of the country entertain upon this question.

But gentlemen say that if you increase the currency you inflate it. Not necessarily; because forty-two million people need more money than thirty-five millions or thirty-two millions. By some statistics which I have here, and which I understand have been very carefully collated, it appears that the currency of the United States in 1865 was over two billions; made up of United States notes, fractional currency and national-bank notes, compound-interest legal-tender notes, temporary-loan certificates and certificates of indebtedness, Treasury 5 per cent. legal-tenders, Treasury notes and legal-tenders past due and not presented, State-bank notes, and three-year Treasury notes, which in the aggregate amounted to $2,111,678,689. To-day you have but one-fifth of that. While you have some eight hundred millions of money, two hundred millions of it is tied up by reserves and gold, while, as I understand the distinguished chairman of the committee which has this bill in charge, a large quantity of money is in the hands of poor people who are hoarding it, so that the country at this time perhaps has not more than four hundred millions of money with which to do the great business of the country.

Now, sir, I do not believe that an expansive, developing country like this is to be tied down to a certain sum of money, and that you say you have reached the ultimate point and that there is no use of going any further. I believe that as we are growing and expanding we must provide some ways and means by which the people can grow and prosper, too. If you have not gold, what better substitute can you find than United States notes and national-bank notes?

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I would remind him that in those parts of the country where there are no banks—and there are whole regions of country where there are no banks for a hundred miles—all the money people have they hold in their pockets, and a number of amounts of fifty and a hundred dollars come to a great deal in the aggregate.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I have no doubt of that. The same is true of the mining districts of Pennsylvania. The county commissioners of the county in which I live desired to borrow money. Though they had banks there they could not borrow from the banks, and they went to the miners, and in a few days they raised from twenty to thirty thousand dollars which the miners were willing to loan the county on the county bonds. And what is true of one county is no doubt true of others.

I have not time to discuss this question as I would like, but the opportunity to speak at length does not present itself, and therefore I desired to say what I have said so that I might be understood upon this question when I shall vote.

I offered an amendment to-day to the fifth section of this bill, in which I propose that the reserve of banks may be invested in a 3.65 per cent. currency bond which the banks may hold and convert at pleasure. Of course they would hold that bond. Gentlemen say to me, "Why, the Government does not want to give the bond when it has no need for the money." That would be true if the Government were not a debtor. But the Government would take that money and buy the gold-bearing bonds, and fund or float a hundred millions of currency bonds which the banks would absorb; so that the Government would be actually saving and making money by that process, and would in a great degree prevent the contraction which happens at certain seasons.

And then I propose in this amendment another thing; and that is that the banks shall not pay interest to banks upon deposits. That was one of the great reasons why there was a panic last year. Money was hoarded in the cities. It was to the interest of the banks in the country to get as large a deposit in the cities as possible, because they were getting interest at the rate of 4 per cent. The banks in the cities desire to make still more, and lend that money at rates of perhaps 8, 10, and 12 per cent., so that the money became scarce in the country and plentiful for speculative purposes in the cities.

The amendment I propose will prevent that. There will not be such a desire on the part of the banks to send their money to the cities, because they get no interest on it; but it will enable them to get very nearly that amount of interest from the Government, and it will enable the Government in that way to get afloat a currency bond and redeem an equal amount of gold-bearing bonds.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allowed me I shall not attempt an extended essay on political economy or theoretically discuss the subject of finance, but in a plain, practical manner, as a practical man, give my views upon the pending bill.

The subject-matter of the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency and now under consideration is one of vital interest and importance to every section of the Union; for the least disturbance of values, either by increasing or decreasing the purchasing power of money, is at once felt in every department of business, alike by producer and customer. We should therefore approach the consideration of this subject not with reference to advantages likely to accrue to sections or localities, but with an eye single to the ultimate good of the whole country.

Gold and silver are made the standard of values the world over, and by which all other values are measured; and any other medium of exchange adopted by the Government in its place should be based upon this standard or its equivalent. Irredeemable paper money, although at present perhaps a necessity, is not the kind of currency demanded by the wants of the people. Therefore any legislation had upon the question of the currency should be in the direction of increasing its value and bringing it nearer to the gold standard; and any legislation looking in the opposite direction, however well intended and however greatly clamored-for by sections of the country, is not the work of wise statesmanship, and in the end will prove deceptive and unsatisfactory.

I am aware that to a certain extent the industries of the country are embarrassed, and that there is distress among the working classes. But this does not arise from the want of sufficient currency to meet the demands of business. This distress and embarrassment spring mainly from illegitimate and reckless speculations on the part of people who are not satisfied to continue in the regular and safe channels of trade and commerce receiving a reasonable compensation for their investments, but who desire suddenly to become rich, and to accomplish that object are willing to take all kinds of risks; and when the bubble bursts wide-spread disaster is the result not only to themselves, but to the laboring man as well.

Now, then, we are asked to do something to better this condition of things; to do something to revive business and prevent the recurrence of disturbances and panics like that of last autumn. The practical solution of this problem is the work before us. Will the measure now under consideration accomplish the purpose?

Section 2 provides—

> That section 22 of the said act (the national banking act) and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Under this section what is known as free banking is authorized, any man being permitted to start a national bank who can furnish and deposit with the Comptroller of the Currency the necessary United States bonds. Now the term free banking sounds well, and under certain conditions may be both right and proper; but if free banking means the unlimited issue of irredeemable paper money, to go to swell the amount of irredeemable currency now in circulation, it is in my opinion a delusion and a snare and can only work disaster to the people.

I know it is often said that free banking is not intended as a measure of inflation, but only to supply the demands of commerce and to furnish the people with banking facilities suitable to their necessities. Now this is all very nice to say, but why do you want more banks, except to put in circulation more currency. Individual banks are and can be established all over the country; and these banks are doing all kinds of banking business, the same as national banks save in this one matter of circulation; so the people are accommodated with banking facilities where a bank can be made profitable.

Should this bill become a law, every bank with circulation established under it will increase the volume of currency to the amount of its circulating notes; and this increase may go on until the national-bank notes outstanding may reach $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000. No man can tell to what extent this irredeemable currency may expand, as there is no limit, no control, as to amount, by the Government. All history and experience teach that as you increase the volume of irredeemable currency in the same proportion you enhance the nominal price of all commodities, thereby encouraging wild schemes of speculation and visionary enterprises. And this is what is called stimulating the industries of the country. This policy renders a fixed standard of values impossible. And while this condition continues the wise and prudent man must stand near the shore, because when this volume of irredeemable currency is liable to fluctuate from day to day, thereby increasing or decreasing its purchasing power, no man is safe. If I purchase a piece of property to-day I cannot tell what it will be worth to-morrow, because the value of currency is constantly changing, and our best calculations may prove deceptive.

There is nothing that works greater injury and damage to the masses, to the producer and the consumer, to the merchant and the manufacturer, to the man of wealth and the laboring man, than this constant changing and unfixedness of values brought about by the unlimited issue of irredeemable currency. That great and learned statesman, Daniel Webster, when speaking upon this subject once, said that "it is one of the greatest of political evils;" that "it is against industry, frugality, and economy, and fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation; and that of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been found more effectual."

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment legislation by this Congress should be with a view to remedy and prevent these fluctuations in the value of our currency, and so far as possible place it upon a firm basis, a basis recognized by all nations in the civilized world. When we attain to this business will stand on an equally sound basis, and all branches of industry will be healthy and the people prosperous.

The exact amount of currency required for the business interests of the country cannot be determined by legislation. Neither is the amount material, when it is based on the standard of the world; as it then becomes redeemable, and for all the purposes of life is as good as gold.

But we are often told, on this floor and elsewhere, that the "panic" was brought on by the contraction of the currency, and that more is needed to prevent any sudden revulsion like that of September last. Now I utterly dissent from this idea, believing the facts do not warrant this conclusion. By reference to the annual report of the Treasurer of the United States, made to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, we find that since the year 1869 there has been no contraction whatever, but rather a small increase in circulation.

On page 329 of this report we have a comparative statement of total outstanding legal-tenders for the last twelve years. But for my purpose I shall only take the years 1869 and 1873, and we shall see how this matter stands. This report shows that there was outstanding of legal-tenders, including fractional currency, on the 30th day of June, 1869, $391,649,558.61, while on the 30th day of June, 1873, there was outstanding, also including fractional currency, the sum of $401,527,267.94, showing not a contraction during this time, but an absolute increase of $9,877,709.33. During this interval of four years, from 1869 to 1873, the country as a whole was prosperous and all branches of industry were remunerative and apparently healthy, when all at once, and to the casual observer without warning, the crisis came and the country was shaken to its very center. Banks, insurance companies, and merchants failed or else suspended, and for a time everything seemed on the very verge of ruin.

Now, then, can this revulsion, sudden and unexpected, be accounted for on the theory that there had been a contraction of the currency, when in fact there had been no contraction; or upon the other equally fallacious one, the want of sufficient currency to meet the legitimate business of the country, when the people had never been more prosperous than during the four years immediately preceding the panic? In view of the history of the times, and the facts to which I have briefly referred, it seems to me no sane man can successfully maintain this position.

No, the panic came upon us from other causes and for other reasons. Paper money had become plenty, and stimulated by a desire to increase profits faster than regular legitimate business would permit, large investments had been made, involving great risk and hazard; credits had been unduly extended to corporations engaged in enterprises requiring the expenditure of millions before any return could be made, and being unable to meet obligations as they became due, a collapse was inevitable. The failure of one or two large concerns of course carried with them many smaller ones. Like a mill upon a stream giving way all below feel the shock, and wide-spread disaster to the whole country followed.

The Committee on Banking and Currency, evidently apprehensive that free banking without redemption would be disastrous to the best interests of the country, provide by the third section of the bill—

> That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of this act, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation.

In my judgment this section practically will be found of very little utility as a preventive of the almost unlimited issue of national-bank notes, and consequently a large inflation of the currency. This Congress has fixed the amount of legal-tenders that can be issued at $400,000,000; and it is the opinion of practical bankers that upon this basis $600,000,000 or more of national-bank notes can be put in circulation, and redemption as proposed by this bill easily maintained, without increasing the relative value of greenbacks. This would give a circulation of $1,000,000,000, sufficient to again unsettle the price of all commodities and set everything kiting.

Again, what is the object of or what is to be gained by this kind of redemption? Legal-tenders are worth no more than national-bank notes. Both are irredeemable, and for all practical purposes are of the same value. You redeem one kind of irredeemable currency with another kind of irredeemable currency of like value, and what does it amount to in a business point of view? It is like taking a dollar from one pocket and putting into the other, thinking that by the operation you have saved something to yourself, or else accomplished some public good. By this system of redemption, with the volume of legal-tenders at $400,000,000, you can never appreciate them so they will be worth more than national-bank notes, and hence this kind of redemption will be no check upon inflation. I look upon this bill as throwing the door wide open to an unlimited issue of irredeemable currency without practical redemption, inflation almost pure and simple; a policy to which I am unalterably opposed, believing, as I do, that a single step in this direction is fraught with danger to the best interest of the whole country, and especially to the poor laboring man, who earns his scanty living by daily toil.

While I am opposed to the bill now under consideration in its present form, I desire to say that I am not opposed to the principle of free banking, nay, would favor it, provided we could at the same time reduce the volume of greenbacks in the same proportion we increase the national-bank note circulation. With free banking, I would retire and cancel legal-tenders as national-bank notes are issued, until the whole amount outstanding should not exceed $200,000,000. This slow but gradual retirement of greenbacks would so appreciate them that before this point is reached they would stand at par with gold, while the aggregate amount of currency in circulation would not be changed a dollar. By this slow and almost imperceptible process the industries of the country would not be disturbed; because, knowing the policy of the Government, every man would shape his business relations to meet this order of things.

When the legal-tenders stand at par with gold no one wants the precious metals; and then more than $150,000,000 of gold, now locked up and only known as merchandise, would at once enter into circulation, increasing the volume of the same to that amount—a truth nearly lost sight of by our friends on the other side. Redemption would then mean something, because it would be made in gold or its equivalent, legal-tenders, and a redundancy of currency by way of national-bank notes under the operation of a free-banking law could not then be maintained, for the reason that, when more was issued than demanded for the wants of trade and commerce, they would immediately be sent home for redemption.

A free-banking law standing upon the basis here suggested I would favor; but a free-banking law with a system of redemption of no practical value to stand as a check against the unlimited issue of irredeemable paper currency, I repeat, can never meet my approval.

I do not favor the plan of the extremists on either side of this question. I am not in favor of any violent contraction, because that would tend largely to a shrinkage of values, and thereby unjustly oppress the debtor class and produce a general derangement and stagnation of business. Neither do I favor any kind of inflation, because in proportion as you increase the volume of irredeemable currency you depreciate its value, thereby working injury to the creditor class. If the increase be very considerable, this depreciated currency becomes plenty, and the nominal price of everything is increased, all sorts of extravagance are indulged by the people, reckless speculations are stimulated, extended credits are given on doubtful security, and the country well on the high road to another financial crash like the one just past. If this is not so, then history is a farce and experience a solemn mockery.

What the country needs is not more currency, but a better one; a currency that can at all times be converted into coin. I have no sympathy with that class of extremists who constantly denounce the legal-tenders as dishonored notes. They are not dishonored notes, for behind them stands the accumulated wealth of the nation pledged to their redemption at the earliest practicable moment. And yet to carry out this solemn pledge, made over and over again by the law-making power of the land and to keep good faith with the people, all legislation should be with a view to an appreciation of these notes and to their ultimate redemption in coin. Any legislation in the opposite direction is a step backward, in violation of good faith and against the judgment of mankind.

When we can make the greenback of to-day what it was when the first $150,000,000 were issued, to wit, convertible into gold-bearing bonds, or when it stands at par with gold, then can we remove all restrictions and establish absolute free banking, because redemption will then regulate the volume of currency required.

Mr. Speaker, the country needs rest, needs certainty, needs stability. As legislators, we should keep in mind this great central thought that it is our solemn duty to give to the people a currency good alike for the rich man and for the poor man; a currency equal in value to the standard of the world. This desirable end cannot be reached in a day nor a year, perhaps not in many years; but any step taken should be forward, and anything less than this will in my judgment work evil, and only evil, to the national interests of the country.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I desire to submit a few remarks on this question; not, however, that I claim to be a financier, and if I were I do not think I should put myself to the trouble to commence with the beginning of the English government and come down to the present day either upon maps, as was done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or otherwise to show what was the proper currency of the people of this country.

I do not think that I could be convinced, though one rose from the dead, that our people have currency enough. How gentlemen have confused this matter I know not; but one thing I do know, that there has been a confusion, whether produced by argument or whether it proceeds from causes that have never heretofore been discovered in the currency Department I am unable to say.

I intend to speak only for my own section of country; for I suppose on this subject, from the number of speeches that have been made, every man can take care of himself. I propose, then, to speak only in regard to my own people. Now gentleman have tried to persuade me of the truth of a great many things I never heard of before. I have understood loyalty to mean a very different thing from what I have heard spoken of as being loyalty on this floor. I have understood capital always to be a very different thing from what it has been asserted to be here.

My friend from Indiana [General COBURN] said to-day very truly that we did not want capital. If you mean by capital property, valuable property, why, sir, in my own State we have iron mines enough, if the iron was made into money, to redeem the entire public debt. But we cannot get the money to pay anybody to work to dig the iron out of the ground. We have this year fifty million pounds of tobacco, and it is now being crowded on the market, and there is not enough money in the banks there to buy one-fourth of it.

I understand, sir, very well the key-stone of this arch of returning to specie payments which gentlemen talk of. They do not want to return to specie payments; they never intended to return to specie payments; I do not believe there is anybody here who really wants to return to specie payments; and when gentlemen talk of returning to specie payments they have no more idea of going there than they have of going to heaven.

Mr. BARBER. We all want to go there.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Perhaps you do all want to go there, and your hope to get there is a good deal stronger and your faith better founded than that of these gentlemen who talk about returning to specie payments. I have heard a story of a gentleman who heard that a bank was getting a little into trouble; it was in the days of the old State banks. He put a great roll of notes on the counter and told the cashier he must have the specie for them. There was a little run on the bank and the cashier tried to pursuade him that the bank was perfectly solvent, that the notes would pass quite readily, and nobody would refuse them, as nobody now refuses greenbacks. And, by the way, I am loyal on this subject. I never refused a greenback since the war. I do not know that I would have refused one during the war if I could have gotten hold of it. The gentleman, however, insisted on getting specie, and had $2,000 worth of silver paid over to him. He tied up that large amount in his handkerchief, and as he was taking it away the handkerchief burst open, the silver was scattered everywhere, and the boys gathered around to pick it up, and he had to beg the cashier to take it back. And so it is with greenbacks now. You do not want specie. The greenback buys everything you need to buy. And I, at least, am not here to say that the faith of this Government is not pledged for its redemption if any man wants it. I shall not say, like some gentlemen who hardly consider it right to call me loyal, that the money of this Government is a printed lie. I will not say that the money issued by this Government, with the faith of the Government pledged on its face for its redemption whenever it is proper to redeem it and best to redeem it, is a falsehood, and known to be a falsehood. I will not say I believe that when this Government in its day of trial to you and of trial to me, too, issued this money and pledged its faith for its redemption, that it was a fraud on the part of the Government when they issued it, and it was bought up by the men who now hold it and depreciate it. I, at least, do not say that the Government intends to commit a fraud.

These gentlemen are more loyal than I am! I should like to see them show it here now. These men claim to have more faith in this Government than I have! Let them show it, then, in some other way than by branding the money of their own Government.

Well, sir, I do not intend to be scared either. Gentlemen from New York tell us that this is not democracy. We have been told by several gentlemen that because we say we want more of this money, and that greenbacks are good enough for us in old Virginia, and that we are not suffering particularly, and are not anxious to get rid of the national-bank notes that we have, that we are not democratic. Now I rather think, sir, I have suffered about enough for what is called the democratic party down my way to have made these gentlemen take to their heels and into the republican party, if they had suffered it. These gentlemen vaunt their democracy when their pockets are touched. The New York Herald and other papers threaten war. There is going to be another rebellion up that way, and I suppose it will commence in New England or in New York. Well, I have not much to say on the subject of war. The Lord willing, I do not want to see any more of t; but if it does come from that quarter, I will be on the loyal side and I will help to see that they are whipped back into this Union in the quickest time ever made.

Sir, there seems to be a great deal of difficulty here as to what caused the panic, and gentlemen persist in saying that it was too much paper money. Well, I do not pretend to controvert their sources of information; but one thing I say, that we were perfectly satisfied in my section of the country that what caused the panic was a scarcity of money. There are plenty of United States bonds down there, bankers tell me; but if they had sold them they would have had to sell them at a sacrifice, and if they had tried to hypothecate them they colud not have gotten a cent even in New York. It was not, then, a plethora of paper money, it was a scarcity of paper money that caused the panic.

Now I think I can give a better reason for what caused the panic than this inflation of paper. If things had been as they were in the days of the confederacy when the paper got so low that forty dollars were worth only one, and when a man who went to market carried a basketful of money and brought back the marketing in his pocket, if it had so depreciated that every one had so much paper that you could not buy anything with it and a panic had taken place, then there would have been some show for saying that a plethora of money was the true reason. But when it is remembered that the depositors in the banks of the city of New York formed in line like an army before the doors of the banks and could not get their money out, because the banks did not have this "irredeemable paper" to pay them with, how was that a plethora of money? These gentlemen get very brave when they come here, but a greater set of cowards were never seen than they were, shivering in New York before the doors of banks and clamoring to the President to let out the $44,000,000 of reserve, and when they were bringing a pressure to bear upon the Secretary of the Treasury to do that which the gentleman from Rhode Island says was a violation of law, which his conscience will not let him sustain. Who made the Secretary of the Treasury violate the law? Who begged him to let out the $26,000,000? The gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency, the distinguished chairman of which sits before me, who besieged the door of his committee-room to get him to report a bill here contracting the currency now, which they begged the Secretary to inflate then, and do it illegally, against law and against the business interests of the country. They inflated themselves by issuing their certified checks to keep their banks from breaking, and pledged each other to take those certified checks as money. They issued near $40,000,000 of certified checks in and around New York, and by organizations all over the country made an agreement that every bank should take the certified checks of another bank as cash, when the people stood at the doors of their banks begging them to pay their debts in these "irredeemable lies" of the General Government.

And now they talk about inflation. They come here and preach to us that we are dishonoring the country; they come here and preach through their Representatives and through the press that we are dishonoring the Government of our country, because we say in answer to the cries of the farmer, the laborer, the manufacturer of this country that to carry on their business there must be more of this irredeemable paper, as they call it, which the laborers, the farmers, and the manufacturers all take so gladly. They threaten us through the press, and upon this floor, with the consequences that must ensue to the country. They seem to think that they have the honor of the country in their keeping. They have got it in their pockets; that is the honor they are afraid of hurting. They know they bought that paper at three for one when the country was flooded with paper money, from 1861 to 1865, when in the North and South there was a flood of paper money; and when in April, 1865, the paper held by these men here—who furnished the officers while the West furnished the men for your Army—these men who made the money on shoddy contracts, these men who made money by the war, while the South was destroyed and the West was injured, when on that memorable day in April, in tears and sorrow, our money turned to ashes and theirs to gold—they come here now and say you shall make that gold even if it grinds the faces of the poor.

As the gentleman from Kentucky before me [Mr. BECK] said to-day, "Is that fraternal love?" Our paper money turned to ashes; theirs turned to gold. Now they come here, having conquered us in the South, having taken control of us by military authority and reconstructed us when we stood submissive as lambs; having brought us back kindly by the hand they said—but they had a thundering big switch in the other hand—they said that they had brought us back and intended to take care of us. They brought us back into the Union; and now they say, "Well, your money turned into ashes, you lost all your property, while our money turned into gold, and we made a great deal of it by the war, and by the help of Providence and the Congress of the United States we are going to keep ours gold, and we do not care whether you have any or not." And you call that fraternal love, kindness, and charity!

Is that the way to take care of a poor neighbor? I verily believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am like the man in the Bible who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell in a certain place among a certain class of people, wounded and sick, and was left on the bank. Here comes one of these Samaritans from New England and passes away off on one side. Then comes a Levite from Connecticut—I expect he had a nutmeg with him—and he passes by.

We are told that we do not want any money; that we are mistaken; that the people in Virginia have made a mistake; that it is capital they want and not money. Well, what sort of capital? We have lands; we have tobacco and a plenty of it; we have good brandy and a great deal of it; we have fine iron mines, and we are trying to work them. A few northern men have come down there among us, with what? With capital? With money, and have put a few of these mines to work. We have not enough of what we call money. We have a plenty of property as a basis for money, and if it could be turned into money we would have money enough. But it is not the sort of thing that you can turn into money. We want money. They say we want capital. I do not care whether you call it capital or not. What we need is a circulating medium, a sufficient amount of currency for the wants of the people of the State.

We pay into the Treasury of the United States Government every year $7,353,000 internal revenue, and we pay into the treasury of the State and for county taxes upward of $4,000,000, making a total of $11,992,000 which we pay each year for taxes. Our circulating medium is but $3,900,000. Now, how can we pay our taxes of $10,000,000 with $3,000,000? We have to get it from somewhere. Where do we get it? We have to borrow money as a State to pay our taxes. Now, when you have to borrow money to pay your taxes do you think that you have money enough? And when a State has to borrow money to pay its taxes to the General Government, do you mean to tell me that that State has money enough? We have crops there which would pay ten times that amount, yet the currency is not there to buy those crops. What are we forced to do then? We are forced to ship our crops to New York. There is the cat in this meal-tub.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MYERS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will close up in a minute or two. I believe I was about to make a speech, but I will change my mind. We have to ship our crops to New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore for the purpose of selling them to get money to pay our taxes. There is the tobacco of the manufacturer. Twenty cents a pound is more than the average cost of the original leaf article in most instances. Now, to put the stamps on his tobacco he must send somewhere to get the money to pay for the stamps in order to be able to get it out and sell it, and he must borrow money. Where does he get it? He hypothecates his tobacco in order to borrow the money. And so it is with the leaf tobacco and with all the other crops. And what do they in New York get? They get all the profit of the transportation; they get all the commercial profits, the brokerage, the insurance, everything of that kind goes there finally. All the profits of the crops of my State now land in these great cities, except the poor profit which the land-owner and the laborer makes.

Mr. MAYNARD. They do not charge you any interest, of course.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. They do not! In other words, under the operation of the currency system of the United States, as now executed upon the South and West, we are "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to these capitalists, having left to us the bare labor of our hands, while they take all the profits that make States great commercially. If our crops were sold in the city of Richmond and the currency circulated there in the hands of our merchants, the profits of the crops would inure to our State except what the consumer pays when the article is retailed out. This profit made from the West on the one hand and the South on the other by the exchange of these commodities through the influence of the currency system in these cities has made these cities rich and left the West and South poor.

The recent panic was caused simply by the fact that men had bought more than they could pay for with the currency that was on hand. There was not currency enough. Though the credit of the people was good, though the credit of the banks was good, though the credit of the merchants was good, there was not enough currency to move the crops and distribute them to the country. This was not found out until the crash came. Then it was discovered that there was not currency enough in the banks to meet the wants of the country; and that deficiency produced the panic.

One thing is certain; we have not in my State currency enough. That is shown to be so by the fact that our taxation is more than twice the amount of our circulation. But gentlemen say, "If you had the means there you could get currency." We could get it there if we had some better system than the present. There ought to be some system of relief under which a single set of men would not have a controlling monopoly. Why, sir, as to this system of national banks, I never in my life heard of but one man who considered it sound philosophy; I never heard of but one man who considered this principle on which the national banks are organized as a fair thing; and that was "Beau Hickman." He spoke of a gentleman "living upon the interest of the money he owed." That is just what the national banks do. The national bank buys up we will say $100,000 of United States bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest in gold; and upon the deposit of those bonds in the Treasury it gets $90,000 in bank-notes, printed without cost to it. Now, while it is drawing interest on the $100,000 of bonds, it turns around and lends out $90,000, getting in my State until lately 8½ per cent. interest. Now there must be a "screw loose" in that operation. By that means the capitalist gets 14 per cent. on his money. This, I reckon, is a part of the "franchise" of which my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. PENDLETON] spoke. The negroes down in my country used to speak of a "franchise," which they regarded as some heavenly kind of a benefit. Now I want to know whether the gentleman from Rhode Island considers that one of the "franchises" of a national bank is the right to shave the people of Virginia at 14 per cent. That is the result of the operation. In other words, the bank lends out the $90,000 that it owes. Such a thing is not right; it is a monopoly. In whose hands is this monopoly chiefly centered? In the hands of people who have forty or sixty dollars per capita of circulation—the New England States. The result is that this system is a grind-stone in their hands, with the faces of the southern and western agriculturists against the stone.

Gentlemen say, "Why do you not establish banks, if you wish them?" We hear that now; we did not hear it a year ago. It was then said that there was not enough currency to establish any more banks down there. The Eastern and Middle States have drawn more than their proportion, and they do not want to give up the excess. Why? Because it is a good thing to have plenty of currency in New York and Philadelphia and Boston, but it is not a good thing to have it in the South and West. A curious state of affairs and bright example of Christian justice!

Upon this question I want to put myself upon the record for my State; and I speak for all parties down there, black and white, republican and democratic. The people of Virginia know that they have not currency enough to manage their affairs—to move their crops and carry on their other business. They want more. If you want to know what sort of currency we prefer, I say that we are truly loyal and will take the genuine legal-tender greenbacks, if it is the same thing to gentlemen of New England, who until lately claimed to have all the loyalty. Lately they have changed their minds about this paper money of the Government, which they say is a "printed lie." But we will take it in the State of Virginia at par, as equivalent to gold. More of this currency is what we say is necessary to give us prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, when you reduce the production of tobacco and cotton you will hear something in regard to the balance of trade which the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] spoke about the other day. The balance of trade against us will be increased just as the exportation of cotton and tobacco is decreased.

Let me finish this point and I will conclude. The effect of a contraction of the currency upon the planting interests of the South amounts to this. There is plenty of land, plenty of the most productive land for cotton and tobacco; but if you narrow the facilities of the men who were brought up and thoroughly understand that interest, who know exactly how to plant and raise profitable crops of cotton and tobacco if they have a fair opportunity to do so, you will to that extent contract and shorten those crops. There will be a continual decrease in the production of cotton and tobacco in the country just as the currency is contracted. That will necessarily be so, because in the South those who raise cotton and tobacco are many of them in debt and have been relying on the borrowed capital of the banks for the purpose of carrying on the planting industries. Many are in debt now, and for the purpose of raising crops must have credit. If, therefore, you should seriously contract the currency and refuse to allow them facilities for raising their crops, you will compel them to give up the raising of large crops of cotton and tobacco, and force them to plant corn and raise their own meat instead of buying it from the West. In that way it will react upon the productive interests of the West; and it will be an injury not only to the South and West but to the whole country, because if we produce less cotton and less tobacco there will be less for the purpose of exportation, and when there is less cotton and tobacco exported we will receive less gold and silver in return, or a less quantity of goods in exchange, and the balance of trade will be against the United States and increased every succeeding year.

Now, in order that the people in the South may raise increased crops of cotton and tobacco it is necessary that the people who are engaged in that interest should have sufficient currency to successfully carry on their operations. You cannot take new men and carry on the planting interest. If you wish to increase the crops of tobacco and cotton, it is better to retain the men who understand the business. Our people in the South are in debt. There are judgment liens upon their lands, as we are told in the West; there are mortgages upon their farms. It is not an inflation of the currency therefore to enable them to procure the means by which they can pay off these debts. And it is for the purpose of relieving the working, the laboring people not only in the South but in the West and all over the country, that we ask for an increase of the currency and greater facilities for its distribution.

It is not an injury to the people of New England if we in the South and West are willing to raise our crops and receive payment in legal-tender currency. If they want to sell their crops for gold and silver we do not object to it, provided they allow us to sell ours for currency when we choose to do so. They are largely the creditor class, and of course they may wish to have gold and silver, but for us who are largely the debtor class paper money is the best. We do not object to the people of New England and the Middle States raising their crops and manufacturing their commodities and requiring gold and silver when they sell them; but we want the privilege of selling ours for paper in our own market towns, in order that we may pay our debts and the State get the benefit of the trade in its own productions.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, on the 9th of last February I introduced a bill which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, to the provisions of which I desire very briefly to call the attention of the House.

In any legislation by Congress upon the finances of the country it is desirable, if possible, to accomplish two things:

First, to take a step in the direction of resuming specie payment; or, in other words, to bring the currency to the standard of gold; and,

Second, in accomplishing this not to reduce or contract the present volume of currency, but rather, if possible, to increase this volume for the business purposes of the country, if this may be done without any additional issue of legal-tenders or national-bank notes.

The bill to which I have referred will increase to a considerable extent the volume of currency without any change in the present limit of legal-tenders and national-bank notes, and will gradually place both on a par with coin.

It provides that the coin received and not required for the obligations of the National Government shall be kept in the United States Treasury, and it requires the national banks to retain as a reserve, instead of the legal-tenders, a portion of the coin which they receive from the United States for interest on the bonds deposited as security for their circulation.

This bill is in the direction of keeping the solemn pledge of the National Government to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of United States notes in coin, and it proposes to place the national banks in a position which will enable them to resume specie payments. This can be done only by accumulating gold and silver, without which no step toward resumption can be taken; and there is no difficulty either on the part of the National Government in reserving its surplus of coin, or on the part of the national banks in retaining a part of their interest in coin.

The national banks will only be required to retain a portion of what they receive in coin from the National Government as interest on their bonds, and the only loss which they will sustain will be the premium on gold, which will be but a small amount. The effect will be to put the banks in a position which will enable them to redeem their notes in coin. The gold thus retained will take the place of the legal-tenders now held as a reserve, and they will pass into and become a part of the circulation for the purposes of trade and commerce. This will make a large increase of legal-tenders in circulation.

There is now deposited in the United States Treasury upward of four hundred millions of bonds as security for the circulation of the national banks; some bearing interest at 6 per cent. and others at 5 per cent.

This increase or addition to the circulation, if all these bonds were at 6 per cent., would be twenty-four millions per annum, and if all were at 5 per cent. would be twenty millions per annum; and if only one-half of this interest was reserved in coin by the national banks the addition to the circulation would be twelve millions per annum at 6 per cent., and ten millions per annum at 5 per cent.; or even if only one-quarter of this interest should be reserved the addition to the present circulation would be increased, if the bonds were all at 6 per cent. six millions, and if 5 per cent. five millions per annum; a larger annual increase than would be secured by the bill proposed at the last session of Congress by the Comptroller of the Currency to increase the national-bank circulation to the amount of twenty-five millions at the rate as proposed of five millions per annum for a period of five years.

The bill also proposes to retain in the United States Treasury any surplus of coin not required to meet the national obligations in coin. It may be in the present condition of the Treasury that the national Government will require its surplus coin to meet its present obligations in coin; but it is unreasonable, as it appears to me, to suppose that the Treasury in the near future may not be able to reserve, without injury to itself or the business interests of the country, an amount of coin which in a few years would enable it to pay upon demand in coin its legal-tenders. There is now in the United States Treasury gold to the amount of about eighty-six millions, and by the last statement of the Secretary of the Treasury two millions of the public debt have been paid during the last month. With the return of prosperity to the business interests of the country there can be no reasonable doubt but that the National Government may be able to reserve an amount in coin which will restore the legal tender in its purchasable value to par with gold.

Since March, 1869, over three hundred millions of the public debt have been paid. If for a few years to come the receipts are applied simply to the current obligations of the National Government and the interest on the public debt, including such amount as may be necessary to keep intact the sinking fund, there will be no difficulty in retaining sufficient gold in the United States Treasury to answer the purposes of this bill and to enable the United States to keep its pledge to the country and the world to redeem in coin the outstanding legal-tenders.

With this reserve in gold in the United States Treasury and in the vaults of the national banks, the legal-tenders and the national-bank notes would soon be at par, and when once the public confidence in this respect is restored, both legal-tenders and national-bank notes will be preferred to gold as a circulating medium for all the purposes of supplying the capital which is required to develop the industrial and commercial interests of the country.

Practically it requires but a small amount of gold and silver to place the legal-tenders and national-bank notes on a par with coin, and to restore the confidence which is necessary to keep them at this point in their purchasable value.

This is true of every specie-paying country in the world, and it has always been true in this country, whatever may have been the nature of the currency used as a circulating medium, whether issued by banks under State or national laws.

It may be said that the accumulation of gold in this way in the United States Treasury and in the vaults of the national banks will raise the premium on gold, depreciate the purchasable value of the legal-tenders and national-bank notes, and thus prove injurious to the business interests of the country.

But why should this be the effect if the accumulations are gradual and comparatively in small amounts, as is provided by this bill? The product of the mines of the country is from fifty to sixty millions per annum. This amount is sufficient to meet any balance of our indebtedness to foreign countries, which for years past has not exceeded if it has averaged this amount. The interest on the public debt as well as the amount required for the sinking fund will hereafter as heretofore be met by the duties on imports; and this small retention of gold, it seems to me, would not disturb the business of the country, nor would it appreciably affect the price or premium on gold.

The proposition of the bill to which I have referred is plain. It seems to me that it is practicable, and if so it ought to be adopted, because it will result in an increase of the currency without any additional issue of either greenbacks or national-bank notes. It is a step in the direction of resumption of specie payment. It keeps the pledge of the National Government and of the republican party, and it accomplishes these ends without disturbing the existing relation of the circulating medium to capital, labor, trade, or commerce. It leaves the legal-tenders at the present limit of three hundred and fifty-six millions; it leaves the national banks to their present issue of three hundred and fifty-four millions. It keeps, I repeat, the solemn promise of the National Government to provide as soon as practicable for the redemption of the legal-tenders in coin; and it leaves the national banks the privileges to which they are justly entitled under existing law, and upon the faith of which, as secured by existing law, they invested their capital in the time of the nation's great peril.

Having thus called the attention of the House to the provisions of this bill, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to reply to the complaints which have been made in the course of the debate of the inequality and injustice of the distribution of the national-bank circulation. Nearly every member of the House who has favored an increase of circulation has presented tables exhibiting how much per capita in proportion to population, how much per square mile in proportion to territory, and how much in proportion to revenues derived by the National Government, the Middle and New England States have received of the national-bank circulation, and comparatively in these respects how small a part the Western and Southern States have received.

These tables, upon such comparisons, no doubt show that the larger part of this circulation is in the Middle and New England States, and upon such comparisons this inequality is made the occasion of charging the national banks in these States with a great wrong and injustice to the other States, and also is made an excuse for increasing the present limit of the circulation of legal-tenders and national-bank notes either by free banking or by other schemes of inflation indefinitely, or to a fixed limit beyond the present issue.

This complaint, in my judgment, is without just cause, whether considered with reference to the necessities of the country when the national banks were established or in the light of the equitable distribution of this circulation under the provision of the law, or the direction which it must have taken if left to the inevitable laws of trade and commerce.

The national system of banking was organized in June, 1864.

Mr. MAYNARD. Was not the original national-bank act passed in 1863?

Mr. EAMES. The act of 1863 was in force for a very short time, and was repealed by the act of 1864. Very few of these banks were organized under it. I know that in the section of country where I reside there were few of them organized under that act. It was not until after the act of March 3, 1865, these banks commenced to organize under this national system.

Mr. MAYNARD. Eighteen hundred and sixty-four?

Mr. EAMES. March 3, 1865, I mean.

Previous to that time the capital which was then invested in the national banks was employed for the purposes of trade and commerce under the laws of the several States. Under the State laws a system of banking existed which supplied the circulation which was required under regulations which made the bills of the State banks safe to the holders and sufficient for the business purposes of the States in which they were located. It was a safe, convenient, and reliable mode of supplying circulation based upon specie payment, and with limitations and restrictions which made these banks safe, and guarded them against any excess of issue by a system of redemption under which in case of excess the bills were returned to the banks of issue for redemption either in specie or its equivalent.

But the necessities of the National Government in its struggle for the life of the Republic suggested the present system of national banking. The revenues of the national Government were rapidly diminishing; its expenses were daily increasing; its legal-tenders, Treasury notes with and without interest, and its bonds were depreciating in the market and had reached their limit either for sale or circulation; its credit was seriously impaired, and it could neither pay nor borrow what was necessary to meet the enormous daily expenditures incurred in defense of the Republic.

At this period, and as a means of restoring the national credit, the national banks were established, requiring the purchase and the deposit in the United States Treasury of a very large amount of national bonds. The States were not inclined to make the change in their existing system of banking, and comparatively few did make the change until by the act of March 3, 1865, a tax of 10 per cent. upon their circulation left them no choice, and in fact compelled them to organize under the national banking law. By this act of March 3, 1865, the State banks were taxed out of existence and forced to accept the provisions of the national law with all its restrictions, limitations, and burdens.

The circulation was limited under the act of June 3, 1864, to 90 per cent. of the bonds deposited, and under the act of March 3, 1865, was to be furnished to each association in proportion to its paid-up capital, if the capital was $500,000 or under 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds; to each when the capital exceeded $500,000 but was not over a million, 80 per cent.; to each where the capital exceeded one and was less than three millions, 75 per cent.; and to each whose capital was over three millions, 60 per cent.

They were required to keep as a reserve in lawful money 25 per cent. in banks of redemption in certain cities named in the act, and 15 per cent. in the other banks organized under the act. Before declaring a dividend they were required to carry one-tenth of their semi-annual net profits to a surplus fund, until it amounted to 20 per cent. of their capital stock.

The stockholders were made individually liable for all debts, contracts, and engagements of the bank to the extent of their stock, in addition to the amount invested in the stock.

A tax of 1 per cent. was imposed upon the circulation; ½ per cent. on the deposits; ½ per cent. on the capital in excess of the bonds; 5 per cent. on the dividends and surplus earnings; and a license tax of ½ of 1 per cent. on their capital; from which sources since their organization millions of revenue have been derived to the National Government annually, of which, derived from the tax on circulation alone, upward of $15,000,000 are in the national Treasury to meet and defray the expenses incurred under this system of banking.

It was under these circumstances that the State banks were forced to accept the provisions of the national banking law and to invest their capital in and organize under the national system of banking then established. Complying with all these provisions, they became entitled to such proportion of the circulation, as then limited, in accordance with the provisions of the law then in force for its distribution. And that is now all they have, and that I venture to assert they are in justice entitled to hold without just cause of complaint from any part or section of the country.

One hundred and fifty millions were distributed according to representative population, and one hundred and fifty millions according to existing banking capital, resources and business, and under these provisions the national banks received only what they were justly entitled to receive. The additional fifty-four millions were reserved for such parts of the country as had not applied for any part of the three hundred millions. This distribution was made under the law. If there was anything unjust or unequal, the injustice or inequality was of the law under which the distribution was made, and upon the faith of which the investments were made by the State banks which organized under it.

The rule of distribution was just and equitable. It can hardly be claimed that the distribution should have been made according to the number of square miles of territory within the limits of a State, or solely upon the basis of population. Based as it was under the law on population, banking capital, resources and business, it was perhaps as equitable and equal a distribution as could have been devised, and if redistributed now the principle which was then adopted would not probably be changed.

Upon this basis the circulation, within the limits fixed by law, was open to the States then in the Union, without distinction, and all the States which desired to make the investment of their capital in United States bonds and organize under the law had a fair and equal opportunity to secure their just and equal proportion of the circulation.

The Southern States were then out of the Union, and had no desire to make any investment in the direction of defending the integrity of the Union or saving the life of the Republic.

The Western States did invest, no doubt, to the extent of their wants or ability, or declined to do so because they could employ their capital in more profitable investments, and some of these States, even after having organized under the law, were not inclined to avail themselves of its privileges, as is evident from the fact that they voluntarily relinquished the circulation which they had received, and went into liquidation.

The other States needing the capital took their just portion, and they retained and used it, and this is the only ground upon which the complaints against them rest. They hold only what is justly their own, and what they have fully paid for. This complaint ought not to have been made, or the comparison between the States should extend to the differences which exist in the wealth of the people per capita, and it would be as just in this respect as is the charge of inequality and injustice in the distribution of the national-bank circulation. And yet this alleged inequality is made the occasion for increasing the currency irrespective of whether the business interests of the country demand such increase or not.

There seems to be a misapprehension of the real profits which are derived from banking under the national system. These national banks hold as actual capital for loan and discount only about seventy-five dollars for an investment in United States bonds that are worth $120 for each $100 of their face. They are subject to onerous taxes upon their capital, circulation, deposits, and earnings.

Their average dividends have not exceeded 10 per cent. on their capital and surplus earnings for the last five years under the existing laws. The purchase of United States 5 per cent. bonds, at a premium of fifteen dollars on the hundred, in exchange for 90 per cent. of their par value in national-bank notes, from 15 to 25 per cent. of which is required to be kept as a reserve, apparently does not offer a very strong inducement for the investment of capital with a reasonable expectation of deriving from it a very large profit.

But, Mr. Speaker, the investments made by the national banks in 1864 were made upon the faith of the provisions of the national banking law then in force. The banks which now hold the circulation which they then received ought in justice to retain it for the twenty years for which their charters were granted.

The act of 1864 under which the national banks organized and received the circulation which they now have provides in the eighth section as follows:

> Such association shall have power to adopt a corporate seal, and shall have succession by the name designated in its organization certificate, for the period of twenty years from its organization, unless sooner dissolved according to the provisions of its articles of association, or by the act of its stockholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless the franchise shall be forfeited by a violation of this act.

To withdraw any portion of it now, or in any way to legislate so as to prejudice their rights and privileges under the law on the faith of which the original investments were made, before one-half of this period has expired, is a wrong and injustice; and the law requiring the withdrawal of any part of their present circulation ought to be repealed, whether it be wise or not to increase the existing circulation or to restrict it to its present limits. The withdrawal of this circulation will be an injury to these banks. It is doubtful if any other portion of the country will derive any benefit from it.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that a national bank is a convenience to any locality where it is established; but aside from this it makes no difference practically where these national banks are located. Their circulation will be employed wherever the interests of business demand it. And I venture to assert that if a new distribution should be made of the national-bank circulation upon the principles of the distribution under the act of March 3, 1865, or upon any sound financial principle, the result would be between different sections of the country as great an inequality as now exists.

Upon any such principle the State which I here in part represent would get more than if the distribution was made according to the square miles within her limits; more than if distributed in proportion to her population; perhaps as much as she now has, and then no more than her just proportion according to the demands of her industries and the capital employed in them, and her ability to purchase the bonds required as security for the circulation issued.

Her present circulation is less now compared with her wealth than it was before the national banks were established. In 1862, as appears by the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, the ratio of her circulation to wealth was 4.7 per cent. In 1873 it was 4.5 per cent. This inequality, therefore, is neither a just cause of complaint against the existing national banks, nor does it furnish any excuse for increasing the limit of circulation as now fixed by law.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the merits of the other plans which have been presented as a remedy for existing evils in the finances of the country. To retire the national-bank notes and issue in their stead legal-tenders, or to issue three sixty-five bonds as currency or as a medium of exchange and thus make the National Government the money agent of the country, is, as it seems to me, a step in the direction of uniting the purse and the sword. It would be far better to retire the greenbacks and issue an equal amount of national-bank notes, and thus divorce the National Government from its unnatural position of acting as the financial agent of the country in furnishing a circulating medium. Free banking is an experiment, and unless based on specie redemption it cannot be foreseen with any reasonble certainty to what extent it will increase the circulation of national-bank notes. In the present financial condition of the country and its industrial and commercial interests, it is no time to enter upon untried experiments.

The bill which I introduced, and to the provisions of which I have called the attention of the House, makes no radical change. It is the suggestion of one of my constituents, a successful business man, familiar with the principles of banking under the State and national systems, and possessed in an eminent degree of that rare quality known as good, sound common sense. It appears to me that no better plan has been suggested. It requires but one thing, the retention by the national banks and the National Government of a small amount of gold, without which under any plan which may be proposed there is no hope of resuming specie payments. I have brought it to the attention of the House in the hope that it will receive its careful consideration, and meet with its approval. Although it is a step in the direction of resumption, it increases the volume of currency without adding to the present issues of legal-tenders or national-bank notes.

[During the delivery of Mr. EAMES's speech, his time having expired, Mr. DUNNELL yielded him a portion of his time.]

question; nor have I had the purpose to do so. I should have said nothing at all during this discussion but for some remarks which were made to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] I may say, however, before alluding to his remarks, that my constituents expect me to vote for some increase of the currency. They would be glad to have a properly guarded system of free banking. In that direction I shall vote if I am able to do so with the bills and amendments which are before the House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] in his remarks to-day gave some data in regard to the railroads of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. I have feared those remarks would be open to a wrong construction and do dishonor to my State. Hence I am inclined to make reference to them.

He said the net earnings of the seventeen hundred miles of railroad in Minnesota in the past year had not been paying the running expenses within more than $3,000,000. It should be here stated that there were expended in that State during the past year much more than $3,000,000 in the construction of new roads or in the extension of roads already in existence. It could not be expected, therefore, that these would give a return upon the money thus expended during that year.

It should also be stated that the roads which have been built in Minnesota for the last two or three years have been built on the frontier of the State; many, many scores of miles built out beyond any inhabitants, out on the vast prairies which we expect very soon to see occupied and well cultivated. Those roads do not now pay. The gentleman might have stated that fact, and not left the impression that the young State of Minnesota was at all in a condition of bankruptcy, or that she was not indeed in a highly prosperous condition. My State was never more prosperous than it is to-day.

One sentence in that extract which the gentleman says he took from the North American Review does injustice to my State. The covert allusion is made there to certain State indebtedness. With our seventeen hundred miles of railroad, our State rapidly filling up, with an increase of twenty, thirty, or forty thousand inhabitants each year, we do not look upon any indebtedness of ours as at all crushing our industries, or at all blighting our fair and brilliant prospects as a State.

I felt that I was called upon, therefore, to make the remark that it should be remembered that in our State, not yet fourteen years old, as a State, we have seventeen hundred miles of railroad; that we have between twenty and thirty million bushels of wheat to send to market this year; that we have made these rapid strides during this time. And I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that not a decade will pass by before these roads will pay good dividends; before all along their lines there will be thrifty towns and well-settled farming communities. I have made these remarks simply in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I know he did not intend to do injustice to my State. But the extract, unexplained, would seem to imply that Minnesota had been unmindful of her obligations, or was indeed in a very bad financial condition.

We want a little more currency out there. Under the Senate bill we are to get some $200,000 more. That probably will meet our demands for the present. We are willing to accept the action of the Senate in this respect. But gentlemen from the East must remember that we of the West need somewhat more of currency. I hope they will concede it to us cheerfully. We need it and can use it in the development of the new West and so help augment the wealth of a common country.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I do not propose to inflict a speech on the House at this late hour of the night, but wish to state one or two conclusions at which I have arrived in listening to the lengthened and protracted debate on this currency question. There are some facts, sir, which stand out so apparent that we would have to close our eyes and shut our ears not to see and hear them. From some sections of the Union comes the cry of "more money" almost with a unanimous voice upon this floor. From other sections the cry is, "No more money, but the quality of money improved." Why, sir, is this difference of opinion on this great question? It can be narrowed down still further when we come to scrutinize this question with a little more accuracy and look into it more closely. You may go into a community and there you will find among members of that community the same divergence of opinion that we find here among different sections of the Union. You will find the citizen who is in difficulty there by extravagance, unfortunate speculation, or in consequence of some calamity that may have overtaken him, wants more currency. His cry is he wants more money. He has not got money enough to pay his debts, and he thinks the volume of currency ought to be expanded, that he may be enabled in some way to realize some portion of the currency for his share in the event of the expansion that he hopes to take place. When, on the other hand, you see the prosperous man, the man of energy and activity, the man who is thriving in his trade and in his pursuits, who is out of debt, you find that he does not want any more currency; he is satisfied to let things remain just as they are now. But this he does want, this he asks—and I state it as the opinion I believe of the entire trading community that I have the honor to represent here—that this question shall be finally settled; that we shall cease to agitate it and discuss it; that we shall bring it to a vote, and do what we are going to do, so that the capital now locked up may go into circulation and supply that very deficiency of which so many gentlemen now complain.

I ask, sir, has it been shown by any man on this floor that there is less currency in the United States now than there was in the summer of 1873? Was there any complaint of scarcity of money then? No, sir. Every branch of industry then throughout the entire land was prosperous. The mines were being fully developed, machinery of all kinds was in active operation. Commerce was flourishing. Agricultural pursuits were being rapidly invigorated. This was the state of things until the panic of September, 1873, came on. Since then this cry of scarcity of currency has been raised. Why has that cry gone up? Has it been because the currency has been contracted? Has it been drawn in since then? Has any of it been burned up or destroyed? No, sir. Beyond the ordinary casualties of trade and the destruction of small amounts of currency by fire or the sinking of steamboats, or something of that kind, not a dollar of this currency has been destroyed. It is now in the hands of our people. Why does it not go into circulation? It is because we want confidence restored. The business men, sir, of the country want to see and to know what is to be the result of all this financial agitation, all this speaking and talking upon the banking question of the country. When that question is settled the man who has the money now will put it into circulation that he may realize the whole benefit of the profit resulting from proper and legitimate trade. That is what we want to put money into circulation.

I listened, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of pleasure to the interesting and amusing speech of my colleague on the other side of the House, [Mr. WHITEHEAD.] In some things I agreed with him and in others I wholly disagreed with him. I was really a little surprised at one position he took. He told us correctly that we paid about $7,000,000 of revenue to the National Government under the internal-revenue laws. We pay about two and a half millions to our State under our system of State taxation, and we pay some three millions annually for county and township taxes. He asks the question how we can pay that out of about three and a half millions of bank circulation that we have in the State; and his answer was that we make up the difference by borrowing the balance. In that last proposition I totally disagree with my honorable colleague.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I see that my colleague misunderstood me.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. Of course I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I know from what my colleague says that he supposed I meant by the word "borrowed" that men borrowed individually to pay their taxes. I did not mean that. I meant and said that it was borrowed by the State of northern capitalists, not that individuals borrowed it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I accept with pleasure the explanation of my colleague and it comes to what my observation is, and I think his observation will confirm me in it. You may go into the State of Virginia, and in the district I have the honor to represent here, in the midst of the tobacco region, and look at the currency of the United States in circulation there, and nineteen dollars out of every twenty of it I undertake to say come from beyond the limits of Virginia, and has not been issued by the banks in our own State. That is where our money comes from.

Go to the town of Danville, the leading tobacco market in my district, and there you will find capitalists from Saint Louis, from Louisville, Kentucky, from New Orleans; and you will see one from New York, and another from Philadelphia, and some from Canada, coming with money in their pockets to buy the leaf-tobacco, for which that region is celebrated, for fancy chewing-tobacco. There is where the money comes from; there is where we get our circulating medium. It is not based on the capital of the banks within our limits. If it was so it would not be adequate to the payment of half our debts. That money is not borrowed; we give our produce for it. It is paid to us for our tobacco and all the surplus produce of that country which we put in market, and for which we receive in the main fair and remunerative prices.

Sir, I say here now that I do not claim that the people of Virginia are so very poor as we are sometimes told we are. It is true we suffered the calamity of war. We lost our slave property. We are now passing through the transition from slave to free labor, and all the incidental disadvantages of that transition have been upon us for the last ten years. But I am happy to say that we are rapidly passing through; that we are seeing ahead of us brighter and better days; and all our people want is stability in the currency, to know what kind and amount of currency we are to have, so that the capitalist may arrange his plans and his schemes of investment; so that the agriculturist may rear his products with a view of knowing the amount of money he will probably receive for it, and its purchasing value when he has received it for his surplus products.

Sir, it is not the amount of money so much as that we want to know whether it is to be more or less, that we may put our house in order and be ready for the change when it comes upon us.

Sir, suppose we increase the banking capital; suppose we put it at any amount we think proper; suppose you increase the national-bank circulation up to $500,000,000, how can we of the South get capital there unless we have means to purchase bonds, upon the faith of which these notes are issued? We must rely upon capital; and it will be idle to talk about an increase of the currency with a view of bettering our condition financially if it is to be bettered by expanding the currency for us.

We can only get banks by having capital with which to buy bonds to place on deposit in the Treasury, upon which the national-bank notes are issued at the rate of ninety dollars in currency for one hundred in bonds. And when we have money to buy the bonds, we have all the money we want, and there is no necessity for laying it out in banking capital, which actually diminishes the amount of currency in our midst; for the money must be used to buy the bonds, and we get but ninety dollars in currency for one hundred in bonds.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I would ask my colleague if he regards the two leading republican papers in the State of Virginia, the State Journal and the Lynchburgh Press, as expressing properly the opinion of the republican party?

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I think they represent the men who are in debt, and not those who are out of debt and want to keep out of debt.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The gentleman does not answer my question. Do they represent the general sentiment of the republican party in Virginia?

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I will answer that question. In my judgment, the great body of the republican party in Virginia are not in debt, because they have not had the credit which would enable them to get into debt. Those who are in debt constitute but a small fragment of the entire republican party in the State.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. My colleague still does not answer my question. I ask him if in Virginia the State Journal and the Lynchburgh Press are in favor of expansion of the currency, of more currency?

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I understand that they are. I see the State Journal daily, and that is the conclusion I deduce from its editorials. But I say in that respect it does not represent what I believe to be the true interests and sentiments of the great majority of the republican party in Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is not my question. I will ask another. Is there more than one paper of the opposite side in the State of Virginia that is not in favor of an expansion or an increase of currency; that is, the Petersburgh News?

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I will answer the question of my colleague, and I will even go further and say that every paper in the State of Virginia might ask for a greater volume of currency. I will not dispute the fact that there are a large number of papers and a large portion of our citizens who want more currency, as they say. But when you come to examine the reason, and ask them why they want more currency, it is because they want to pay their debts in a currency that costs less than that for which they gave their notes and bonds. I consider this the true standard; when I give my bond for $100, either in currency or in property to be measured in currency, no act of legislation should release me from paying the last cent I contracted to pay not nominally in currency, but actually in currency of the same purchasing power that was in existence at the time I entered into the contract.

So, on the other hand, I hold it to be demoralizing if you permit a man to contract a debt and stimulate him with the idea that you will so inflate the currency as to enable him to pay that debt with less than he received. That is discouraging to industry. I hold that the true doctrine is this, in relation to the industries of our country of all kinds: Let the currency be sound, free from fluctuations; let every man be able to deposit a dollar in a bank or elsewhere with the confident assurance that it will not diminish in value, that he will not be stimulated to speculate upon it, for fear it may become less valuable by depreciation; let him be encouraged to accumulate his gains day by day, and add to his earnings until his savings are sufficiently large in amount to enable him to buy something of value to himself or to his family.

Money, it is true, may at times be easily acquired. But money so acquired is spent with the same kind of ease, and it is not accumulated in our hands. This complaint of a lack of currency, in my judgment, and as far as my observation goes, rests upon the fact that there are many persons in this country who want to make money but are not willing to wait the slow, regular, consistent course of honest industry. They want to make it by speculation of some kind or other, and what they want is more money to go upon, and they think if you will swell the volume of the currency by some indefinable process a portion of it will find its way into their pockets when they have nothing to give for it, and thus they will be enabled to engage in some wild speculations that may or may not inure to their benefit.

[Mr. FIELD addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, I find that thoughtful men judge that no currency measure is likely to be adopted that will do any good. The chances are that any change likely to be made will work mischief. If currency matters should grow worse, as they certainly will with the adoption of the report of the committee, at the next session mine or some similar plan will come up with invincible strength. But it seems to me to be scarcely less than an insult to the intelligence of the House to suppose that, looking through the vision of unprejudiced intellectual operations, members will not fail to discern that the committee's bill is framed in the interest of the bank monopoly and will be disastrous in its effects upon the business and industry of the country.

I believe I have presented the true plan for a national currency. Will it not pay off at once about $380,000,000 of the national debt, or about 20 per cent. of the total? That is not a small matter, but it is among the least valuable features of the plan. It will relieve the people forever hereafter from the fears of a possible suspension of bank redemptions and from the fearful mischiefs of actual suspensions. It would secure the people from the manifest and manifold ills which grow out of a changing volume of currency; and inasmuch as the currency could not pass out of the country, it would always have the same purchasing power in the country; and finally, and best of all, the currency would be of the same value in every town in the Union and in the purse of every inhabitant of our broad land. If it were once established and in general circulation the people would never give it up. Industry would thrive, production would increase, commerce would flourish, and wealth accumulate, so that within a few years the balance of trade would be in our favor, and we should very soon become the money-lending instead of a money-borrowing people.

I call the attention of the House to the circumstance that our fractional paper currency amounts to nearly $50,000,000; that it is approved and preferred to metallic currency by everybody; and that it is very nearly identical with "the money of the United States" provided by the bill I have advocated. It contains no promise to pay; is redeemable in paper money which is itself irredeemable; is receivable in payment of certain dues to the United States in sums less than five dollars, but is not a tender in payment of debts. Yet it is popular, and it is believed would be at full par with silver coin if it had the quality of legal tender. And it is said over $10,000,000 of fractional currency has been lost or destroyed—so much clear gain to the Government.

An amount equal to nearly the whole volume of greenbacks each year passes into and out of the public Treasury in public dues and in liquidation of the debts of the country. And a currency thus steadily redeemed every year by the party issuing it will have a better redemption than any currency yet known in this country.

Of course the question of the currency is and always will be a great theme, one very difficult to treat, and one which I do not now for lack of time propose to discuss in even a cursory manner. Fortunately the popular mind is no longer under the spell of gold, and can think of money other than of the metallic type. But, as I said, I do not propose to discuss the general subject at this time, and shall have accomplished all that I desire in obtaining the floor when I have stated that I heard and read the speech of the gentleman on the committee from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] and found that in his reference to my remarks on the bill to provide the money of the United States and to regulate its value he satisfied himself with irony instead of trying to satisfy the House with sensible argument. If he is content with that I have no doubt the House is. If an opponent's arguments are not worthy of candid response they are not worthy of any notice. I will merely add that a debater who resorts to irony, ridicule, or denunciation does so because he cannot afford to allow the positions of his antagonist to remain unanswered, and does not feel competent to refute them.

My colleague [Mr. COX] yesterday in a carefully elaborated speech—the commas and semicolons being duly set in their places in print before it was read in the House—having paid his respects to me, albeit in a left-handed manner, I take the first opportunity to repay the obligation. It is eminently Coxian and good natured, and I do not complain of it at all. I hope my response will not be construed in any different spirit. The gentleman from New York City, my colleague, [Mr. COX,] is a phenomenon. In his case the sun rose in the West, and he had a splendid career for a while. His unexampled wit, his extraordinary erudition and altogether resplendent eloquence, had been heard in the prairie country so much, so often, and so long, that, like a redundant currency, it fell off in value as it increased in volume. And having a sharp insight to the main chance and a pretty clear apprehension of surrounding circumstances, he concluded to seek new fields of enterprise, and took up his carpet-bag and emigrated to New York. Having proved not altogether a success among the clear-headed independent population of the West, he set himself down and selected a constituency in the city of New York. He offered himself to Tammany Hall—to the Tammany Society (which, by the way, is an eminent charitable organization in the city of New York, made up of wise sachems and extraordinary braves, such as Matt. Brennan, who is just out of jail, John Morrissey, the statesman-prisoner Tweed, and like characters) just at the time when, by an exposure of its financial enterprises, most all of its leading men had been convicted of felonies or escaped conviction by prompt emigration. Tammany had the sense to see that the young and versatile orator of the West would be a brilliant trump-card. They were not mistaken. Though a carpet-bagger, they adopted him and embraced him, and sent him here; and here he is, in his own language, "fresh as a dew-drop glittering on a rose," and quite as weighty in the counsels of the House.

It will not be denied that he is possessed of a versatility of talent, a keen faculty of party management. He contested the speakership with his veteran colleague on the basis of opposition to the salary-grab. Having ascertained that "that cock would not fight," he received his pay, it is alleged and has not been denied, for the first month of his service in this Congress at the rate of $36,000 a year. Having accomplished this financial achievement, "honors were easy" between him and the "back-pay" men. Though he was evidently yesterday confused on financial matters, he was clear-headed enough when he was drawing his pay at the rate of $36,000 a year. And it is to be hoped that this treasure is laid up where his famous "moths" do not corrupt. I claim for my colleague great versatility of talent. Who doubts it? Not only an orator, a financier, he is also the funny man of the House. Though he has not donned the motley, it is evident enough that he has proved himself entitled to wear it. If not by "the adamantine necessity of nature," certainly by "the eternal fitness of things," "motley's his only wear."

He unblushingly boasts, if I understand him, that he voted against issuing greenbacks when the exigencies of the country were such that it was indispensably necessary they should be issued in order to carry forward the war. Probably if the gentleman's record were to leap to light it would be found that this was but one of a long line of unpatriotic votes during the war.

A gentleman having built and ensconced himself in so fragile and unsubstantial a political house of glass can hardly expect to be allowed to sit in his open window and throw stones at passers by with impunity. To uncover his record would be to expose him to criticisms which a wise prudence would shun, even though in a case where "shame being lost, all virtue is lost."

The gentleman charges me with the atrocious crime of having beaten two Democrats in my district in the congressional canvass. I hope I do not exceed the modesty of nature when I say that I am confident I could have beaten six. I prefer to have been sent here from having run upward of a thousand ahead of the republican ticket, to have been sent here as the accident of an accident, and that accident the accident of death. At least I trust I should not have attempted to profit by a dispensation of Providence at the rate of $36,000 a year.

Now, my colleague is in the habit of introducing nursery rhymes in his speeches. Following his precedent, I venture to present him one upon which he is at liberty to practice in his leisure moments, (it may be sung to the tune, "Mary had a Little Lamb:")

My colleague had a little month,
A little month, or so;
He seized a pile of good greenbacks,
Shouting, "Reform! Heigh-ho!"

And then, on motion of Mr. DUNNELL, (at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to receiving and disposing of revenue stamps and public moneys; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a petition of citizens of Franklin County, Vermont, praying that Uriah Bundy may be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the petition of Frank Arnim, of South Carolina, praying for compensation for capturing the lost ledger of the southern confederacy; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SARGENT presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, praying for an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the harbor at Oakland, in the San Francisco Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of the administrator of John A. Stevens, deceased, praying compensation for property destroyed by United States troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAGER. I present a petition of sundry citizens of California, praying for the sale of grazing lands in the mineral sections of that State, which is a prayer substantially for the passage of a bill introduced by my colleague for the purpose indicated. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to use their earnest endeavors to procure the passage of a law to so reduce the charges for transmitting messages by telegraph as to pay only a fair profit over working expenses and a reasonable rate of interest on the appraised value of the lines now in operation throughout the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of William Moses, of New Orleans, Louisiana; Felix Halff, of Galveston, Texas; and Leon Rouff, of Indianola, Texas, praying that jurisdiction may be given the Court of Claims to hear and determine their claims for cotton seized by the Government of the United States, and to render final judgment thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 955) for the relief of J. L. Tedrow, of Clarke County, Iowa, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2452) to equalize pensions in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at Arlington, Virginia, praying compensation for the use of their chapel by the military authorities of the United States, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 682) for the relief of the board of trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at Arlington Heights, known as Hunter's chapel.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Blanton, widow of Burrill Blanton, of North Carolina, a soldier in the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an investigation of the affairs of the Pension Bureau, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Albert Ross to the active list of the Navy, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 683) to authorize the use of gilt letters for the names of vessels; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the meaning of that?

Mr. GORDON. I will simply state for the information of the Senator from California that the law now requires that the names of all vessels shall be painted in white letters on a black ground, and there are certain objections to that which it is not necessary to explain to the Senate at this time. This bill is simply to authorize the use of gilt letters or yellow letters.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary W. Jones, widow of the late Commodore Thomas C. Jones, praying that she may be restored to the pension-list at the rate of fifty dollars per month, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2350) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificate of registry and enrollment to the schooner Almina, and changing the name to Minnie Davis, reported it without amendment.

STEAMER FANNIE LEHR.

Mr. DENNIS. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2124) authorizing the changing of the name of the steamer Fannie Lehr, to report it back without amendment. It is a very short bill, and I will ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the owners of the merchant-steamer Fannie Lehr, a vessel of American ownership and register, to change her name, and that she be hereafter known as the Cockade City.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one practice which has become exceedingly inconvenient, and that is the ordering of bills to be printed when they are introduced. It cumbers up our bills enormously. I hold in my hand a private bill for the relief of somebody, which has been printed three times; first when it was introduced, second when it was referred to committee, and then when it was reported. There have been five thousand copies of that bill printed, and I do not suppose it has been read by any one. I do not see why private bills should be printed at all until they are reported from the committee to which they are referred. Then I think every bill should be printed. Our files are very cumbersome. The other House is exceedingly liberal to us. They have sent us over about three thousand printed bills, and we have a quarter of that number on our own files. It is very discourteous to object when a Senator desires to have a bill printed; but I hope Senators will be considerate and not ask to have bills printed when introduced unless there is some special reason for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Rhode Island has not been quite ingenuous on this subject. Two of the prints of the bill alluded to by him are at the other end of the Capitol, for which we are not responsible.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I should suppose that so fine a parliamentarian as he is would not undertake to influence the action of the Senate by what that august body over there does. Of course where a bill has been printed in the other House, it ought not to be reprinted here unless there be some change which makes it necessary; but I believe there is economy in printing bills when they are introduced, particularly private bills. Senators ought to see private bills, which always involve claims upon the Treasury; and if you send a manuscript bill to a committee and have it reported in manuscript and not printed then, as sometimes it might not be, the first we should know we should find that we had been egregiously mistaken, to use a very soft phrase, about some bill that we had passed for somebody, that it meant a great deal more and proposed to pay a great deal more than would have been deemed useful or desirable had we known more about it and seen it in print.

I hope, therefore, we shall not enter upon the mistaken economy of saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung by refusing to print bills which involve the claims of people upon the Treasury, and the careful scrutiny of which is indispensable to the public interests, and which cannot be had unless we can see them in print.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask the Senator whether these remarks apply to bills on their introduction?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; that is one of the very times. A bill goes to a committee in the first place. If the work of the committee is divided up, all the committee cannot know what the bill is properly if it is in manuscript, because only one member can have it at a time, and only one person can see it at a time. If an amendment is proposed, it is extremely inconvenient to a committee that all its members should not see exactly what the amendment is going to be and where it comes in; that is, if we go on the assumption that a committee is going to do its duty and really scrutinize a bill that is before it. If you are to take everything for granted, have attorneys and claim agents draw up bills (as I understand they frequently do) and slip them through committees; and if the Senate is to take for granted what a committee does, then of course printing is a useless expense. But if, on the other hand, the committee is to take a bill and look at it as a partnership of gentlemen would look at a claim upon them, and see that every line and every word of it is so scrutinized that it will mean exactly and no more than that which you understand it to mean, then I say the printing of a bill when it is introduced is a wise and useful expenditure of money.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope I may be permitted to make a single remark. I do not know that I disagree with the Senator from Vermont, except as to the printing of bills on their introduction. A great portion of the bills here are private bills of four or five lines. So far as the convenience of the committee is concerned, I certainly cannot see any convenience in printing a bill of that sort. Of course it can be comprehended at a glance. Besides, sir, this printing involves a considerable expense. Sixteen hundred copies of each of these bills are printed upon their introduction. Then, when the bill is reported, if there is the slightest amendment, sixteen hundred more are printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. And printed whether there is an amendment or not. Here are three copies of a bill that are identical. One printing certainly would be sufficient for all purposes of publicity in such a case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I took occasion at an early period of the session to examine and see the amount of expenditure for this purpose, and it was very large. It amounts to many thousands of dollars for the printing of bills, which to a very great extent is useless. I make this suggestion, and I think it is entirely practicable, and one that would meet the objection the Senator from Vermont raises: that the rule should not be to print all bills on their introduction; but if the bill be of a character to justify its printing, it might be an exception to the general rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark that since the attention of the Senate was called to the subject no private bills have been printed by direction of the Clerk, except those so illegibly written that it was very difficult to read them. The other bills printed have been by order of the Senate. The Chair repeately called for objections, but never heard one, and for a long time has not formally called for objections to motions to print bills.

Mr. ANTHONY. When a bill is printed upon its introduction in the other House and then sent over here, as it is always, that gives us all the publicity that we require for an ordinary private bill, and the subsequent printing is an entire waste of money.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island, could not this matter be remedied at the printing office? If it is not necessary, why strike off these copies a second time?

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing office obeys the orders of the Senate. Nothing is printed unless it is ordered by the Senate or the other House.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the printing of bills is the most useful printing that is done for Congress. Upon the text of those bills and its carefulness depends of course the accuracy of the laws we subsequently publish. In the haste in which many of our proceedings are transacted it is almost impossible, especially sometimes as bills are read in confusion at the Clerk's desk, to hear the text and know exactly the phrase; and yet upon a critical construction of the phrase of those laws depend the most valued rights of individuals and frequently those of the Government. It seems to me we ought to retrench in printing almost in any other direction than in the manner of printing bills. There are many documents that we print to the number of hundreds and thousands of volumes that are not read afterward, that become mere useless lumber, that we hardly care to send to our constituents, that might well be dispensed with; but a file of bills, showing how a particular measure stood originally and the amendments that were subsequently made to it, is invaluable, it seems to me, to every Senator for a matter of reference.

I trust there will not be a restriction in the mere matter of printing bills. I think, however, our bills could be printed in a different form. Instead of having these wide margins and great spaces between the lines, they might be printed more in document form; but that they should be printed for the information of the Senate in every stage of the bill where it is possible I am satisfied is entirely useful for correct legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no motion made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 684) for the relief of the widow and heirs of John A. Stevens, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 685) to authorize the Librarian of Congress to send books to the governor of Iceland, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

BRIDGE OVER WILLAMETTE RIVER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the motion by which the bill (S. No. 482) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River, at Salem, in the State of Oregon, was indefinitely postponed, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to reconsider——

Mr. CONKLING. When was the bill indefinitely postponed? Certainly a motion to reconsider cannot be in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will examine the record and ascertain.

Mr. CHANDLER. I asked unanimous consent that it might be done.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator want the bill recommitted?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion will be entertained.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

DISBURSEMENTS BY ARMY OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 912) to provide for the inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill makes it the duty of the Secretary of War to cause frequent inquiries to be made as to the necessity, economy, and propriety of all disbursements made by disbursing officers of the Army, and as to their strict conformity to the law appropriating the money; also to ascertain whether the disbursing officers of the Army comply with the law in keeping their accounts and making their deposits; such inquiries to be made by officers of the Inspection Department of the Army or others detailed for that purpose, but no officer so detailed is to be in any way connected with the department or corps making the disbursement. The reports of such inspections are to be made out and forwarded to Congress with the annual report of the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MENNONITE SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 655, which I think ought to be acted upon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object.

Mr. WINDOM. If it be in order I move to postpone all prior orders and take up that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. WINDOM. The bill is reported back with a substitute. Let the substitute be read.

The Chief Clerk read the substitute as reported from the Committee on Public Lands by Mr. WINDOM for the bill (S. No. 655) to enable the Mennonites from Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object. I think it ought to go over and be considered. It involves a very important question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to take up the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. On the appeal of the Senator from Vermont, who desires to examine this bill, I will permit it to go over until to-morrow. I would desire him and other Senators to examine it as early as possible. If the bill is to pass at all, it is important it should pass very soon; and I hope it may be considered at an early day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no disposition to delay it, but it involves a very important question as to the propriety of this species of legislation in a republican country like ours, and I think Senators ought to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bills on the Calendar regularly.

ROSE HILL CEMETERY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill cemetery; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Whatever title the United States may have acquired in and to a portion of the ground held and owned by Rose Hill cemetery, a corporation so known under the laws of the State of Tennessee, by virtue of a contract and agreement made and entered into in May, 1866, by the officers of the cemetery on behalf of the corporation, and G. W. Marshall, captain and assistant quartermaster-general United States volunteers, on behalf of the United States, is by the bill released, quit-claimed, and set over to the president and directors of the corporation, and their successors in office, to be by them held as though the agreement and conveyance dated in May, 1866, had not been made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN LAUBE DE LAUBENFELS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that John Lauben de Laubenfels, being of foreign birth, and holding a title of nobility, desiring to become a citizen of the United States, renounced his title of nobility; that being informed that it was also necessary for him to renounce his name, he assumed the name of John Rziha, under which name he entered the Army of the United States, and now holds the rank and commission of a captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry, under the name of John Rziha; and that he is desirous of resuming his own name. The bill therefore directs the Secretary of War to change, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, to John Laube de Laubenfels.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to ask what committee that bill comes from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a report from the House committee which expresses the views of the Committee on Military Affairs. If any information is required further, that report can be read.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not wish the report read, and I have no objection to this gentleman's name being changed; but the preamble strikes me as a very improper one. Those reasons ought not to have been set out in the preamble commencing with "whereas so and so has a title of nobility." I really do not know whether he has a title of nobility or not, and I should like to ask whether the committee who reported this bill know the fact that this gentleman had a title of nobility, and if so what the title is. It seems to me that it is not necessary for the Congress of the United States to pass an act asserting that this man has a title of nobility. If he comes here to have his name changed, let us vote to change the name. I do not mean to obstruct the passage of the bill, if the committee are in favor of it, by making any motion; it is too small a matter; but I think it would be better if the preamble were stricken out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN and others. Make that motion.

Mr. STOCKTON. I move to strike out the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 100) for the relief of Lieutenant Alonzo V. Richards; and

An act (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad, in Wisconsin.

ARMS FOR SETTLERS IN NEBRASKA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to instruct the Secretary of War to cause two thousand effective breech-loading rifled muskets and four hundred thousand cartridges to be forwarded to and placed at the disposal of the governor of the State of Nebraska, for distribution among the settlers of the exposed localities in that State, for home defense against Indian raids; and the governor of the State, in making the distribution, is to take, from the parties to whom they may be distributed, good and sufficient security for the return of the arms to the United States after the necessity for their use has ceased.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the bill by inserting in line 7, after the word "Nebraska," the words "and the same number of muskets and cartridges to be forwarded to and placed at the disposal of the governor of the State of Kansas;" and also by making the necessary grammatical corrections in lines 8 and 9 by striking out the word "governor" and inserting "governors," and striking out "State" and inserting "States."

Mr. WEST. I merely call the attention of Senators who favor this bill to the fact that they propose an issue of ammunition and ask for it to be returned.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator is mistaken. If he will read the bill he will see the security is for the return of the arms, not of the ammunition.

Mr. WEST. Then I was wrong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LOGAN. I was about to remark that after consultation with some of the Committee on Military Affairs in reference to the bill I am willing that that amendment shall be placed on the bill; but I wish to state to the Senate, so that they may not misapprehend it, the intention of the bill. We have been in the habit heretofore of giving arms to the Territories for this purpose, and this is an exact copy of the law that provided muskets for the Territory of Dakota. The governor of Nebraska himself appeared here and made a statement to me of the necessity of this measure, and upon the evidence he furnished the committee reported the bill for that State, copying it from the law for Dakota, providing the same number of arms and the same kind of security for the return of the arms to the Government of the United States. On the representation of the Senators from Kansas that there is a necessity on the borders of that State for the same thing, I have no objection to the amendment that is now offered, so that the bill shall provide for both of those States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to inquire, is this an addition to the usual distribution of arms to the several States?

Mr. LOGAN. There is no distribution of arms to the several States. There has been a bill before Congress for several sessions providing for it, but it has never passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There has been in former years.

Mr. LOGAN. Heretofore.

Mr. WEST. And there is now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator understand that this measure is recommended either by the War Department or the Interior Department as a public necessity?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; we have not asked the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior in reference to it. This is a matter that has been done heretofore for the protection of settlers on the frontier, and upon the same principle we reported this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We have done this thing in regard to the Territories, but I had not supposed that we had been in the habit of doing it in reference to the States. If there is a precedent for it I should like to see it.

Mr. LOGAN. The principle upon which these bills have been passed heretofore has been for the protection of the settlers on the frontier; and it makes no difference, so far as that is concerned, whether they be in the States or in the Territories. There is as much necessity for the protection of the frontier settlers in the States as in the Territories.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Territories always got arms under the old distribution.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course they did, just the same as the States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator that there is an obvious distinction between the Territories and the States, because the Territories are very much under our own direction and protection, while in the States——

Mr. LOGAN. The Territories, under the law of distribution heretofore, have had the same right as the States precisely, if I understand the matter correctly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate will see that this measure will necessarily involve the Government in very considerable expense. Whether the Government has these arms to distribute or not I do not know; perhaps the Senator does. If not, it will involve the necessity of a purchase of the arms at a very large expense. I doubt very much whether it is within the power of the Government to furnish these arms out of the armories at present. I do not know how that is; perhaps the Senator does.

Mr. LOGAN. There is always on hand a large surplus of arms that are generally sold for almost nothing. That is about the result of it. Instead of letting the arms go to where they can be useful, they are generally sold and bring about $2.50 a piece Guns that it cost from $20 to $25 to make are sold at from $2.25 to $2.40 and $2.50. That is the average price when they are sold at auction. I think it would be better to let them go where they will be of benefit to the frontier people than have them sold at auction, for they do not bring enough to pay expenses when sold in that way, after being condemned.

Mr. CONKLING. With but a moment to look I find in 1808 an act providing—

> That the annual sum of $200,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated for the purpose of providing arms and military equipments for the whole body of the militia of the United States, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States.
> SEC. 2. All the arms procured in virtue of this act shall be transmitted to the several States composing this Union, and Territories thereof, to each State and Territory respectively, in proportion to the number of the effective militia in each State and Territory, and by each State and Territory to be distributed to the militia in such State and Territory under such regulations as shall be by law prescribed by the Legislature of each State and Territory.

Then I find that the act of 1816 provided that—

> The annual sum of $200,000, as appropriated for the purpose of providing armies and military equipments for the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, according to the act of the 23d of April, 1808, entitled "An act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," shall be paid for each year, respectively, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And this is followed by some other provisions which I will not stop to read on this subject. I inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether these acts have ever been repealed?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that they have been repealed. I have not examined for the purpose of ascertaining, but I know that there has been no appropriation for years for the purpose of carrying out those laws.

Mr. WEST. I think the Senator from Illinois is mistaken. There is a standing appropriation of $200,000 per annum, which I will show in a few moments as soon as the Book of Estimates comes in, to enable the Secretary of War to distribute arms to the militia in the different States annually.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know any State in my part of the country that has any organized militia; there may be some in New England.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly there is an appropriation for this purpose, unless the act to which I have referred has been repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has not been.

Mr. CONKLING. The provision in terms is that "the annual sum of $200,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated." That makes a standing appropriation.

Mr. MORTON. That is simply for the purpose of providing arms, not ammunition.

Mr. CONKLING. It provides for more than arms.

Mr. MORTON. I never knew any ammunition to be sent to a State. I have known arms to be sent.

Mr. CONKLING. The act of 1816 provided "that the annual sum of $200,000, as appropriated for the purpose of providing arms and military equipments for the militia, either by purchase or manufacture," "shall be paid for each year respectively out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MORTON. That does not provide for ammunition.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us see about that. I find in the Book of Estimates handed me by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] this item among the permanent specific appropriations.

> Arming and equipping the militia:
> Specific appropriation of $200,000 annually for the purpose of providing arms and military equipments for the whole body of the militia of the United States.

The Senator from Louisiana, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, tells me, I do not know the fact, that they do take it in ammunition and other things as they please. Am I right in that?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I will say practically from my knowledge of the administration of that law, that ammunition is not furnished to the States, but simply arms, accouterments, and equipments.

Mr. WEST. This $200,000 is a permanent appropriation made annually to the several States according to their population, and it is discretionary with the governors of the States to take the value of that amount that may be appropriated to their particular locality or particular State according as the necessities of the military service in that State require. That is to say, if a State needs Gatling guns, the governor can call for them; if he needs sabers, he can call for them; if he needs ammunition, he can ask for it; but it must all be computed at a certain valuation and they get so much. That is the fact.

Mr. INGALLS. I would call the attention of the Senator from New York and also of the Senator from Louisiana to the fact that this bill does not provide and is not intended to provide for the distribution of arms to the militia, but is simply for the purpose of meeting a temporary exigency that is supposed to exist on the frontier. It does not provide for the distribution of arms or for their donation to the State, but that they shall be placed at the disposal of the governor, and that a bond shall be taken from each person to whom they are furnished providing for their return to the Government whenever the exigency has ceased. A difficulty is supposed to exist upon the frontier both of Kansas and Nebraska from incursions apprehended from the Sioux upon the northwest and from the Comanches and Kiowas upon the southwest. The settlers are apprehensive of difficulty; and this bill merely provides for a temporary disposition of arms to be placed at the control of the executive to meet that supposed exigency at present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana is quite right in regard to the law as it now stands for the distribution of arms; but he will notice that this distribution is in proportion to the population, and if he will look still further he will find that the annual quota of my State is ninety-six. That of course is a very small number, and the State is now practically without arms while the Indians themselves are well armed. This is simply an advance of that quota to meet the present exigency. I trust, therefore, that there will be no further opposition to the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Replying to my friend on my right, [Mr. LOGAN,] he will remember that the Senator from Maine inquired whether these arms were to be in addition to the distribution of arms to the militia, and he was answered that there was no distribution of arms to the militia; and it was to settle that doubt that reference was made to existing statutes. Now, the Senator from Kansas is quite right in saying that this distribution is not to be to the militia of the State. I confess, with my limited knowledge of this subject, I wish it were to be to the militia of the State. On the contrary, "two thousand effective breech-loading rifled muskets and four hundred thousand cartridges" are "to be forwarded to and placed at the disposal of the governor" "for distribution among the settlers of the exposed locality in said State." That speaks of border war; it speaks of unorganized and undisciplined war; it speaks of an employment of these arms and the firing away of this ammunition in modes by no means as well guarded and limited as we might suppose they would be if the arms were to be handled by militia or organized troops.

I call attention to this not to say that it is a sufficient reason for refusing to pass this bill. I do not know enough about it to venture to take such a responsibility; but I say that I wish the facts were such that an issue of arms to militia, to known military men amenable to the rules and responsibilities applicable to them, was all that the case required, rather than a distribution at hap-hazard, upon application to the governor, to settlers, and settlers in regions exposed to Indian hostilities.

Mr. LOGAN. As far as this bill is concerned, it was not considered in committee in connection with the distribution of arms. That was the reason I made the answer I did in reference to that point. I had not examined it. The question of distribution is one that never comes before us at all, and therefore I did not examine it. This is entirely outside of that. It is following a precedent which has been set heretofore for the protection of the settlers. Under the law of distribution, as read by the Senator from New York, the arms are distributed to the militia of the various States according to population. There are some of the States, especially the Western States, that have no organized militia at all, and under this law would have no distribution of arms whatever.

But the objection made to this bill by the Senator from New York is not an objection, in my mind, at all. He says he prefers that arms should be distributed to the militia. Now, what is the militia? The militia is a mere organization of the citizens of a State. They elect their own officers to control them. They are not soldiers; they are not officers; they belong to no army organization, get no pay, but are mere citizens organized together for the purpose of learning the drill of the soldier, and that is all there is to it. This is a distribution of arms to the settlers for their protection by the governor of the State. They are to be distributed in his discretion, of course, to parties whom he has confidence in that they will use them in a discreet and proper manner. On the frontier we generally find it the case that in different neighborhoods they have organizations for protection, organizations for the protection of person and property, organizations for the purpose of defense against raids made by the savage tribes of the plains. These organizations are of the character of militia, but they are not militia. They are mere neighborhood organizations for self-protection.

Now, is not the discretion of the governor sufficient to distribute arms where good security is taken? Is a man who is worthless and not to be trusted one who will be likely to give security for the arms distributed so as to hold the Government harmless and safe? The bill leaves the discretion in the hands of the governor to distribute the arms to men who are discreet and proper men for the purpose of using them in defense, and not for any other purposes. I do not live on the frontier, but I know enough about it to be thoroughly convinced that if the border settlers were armed by a discreet governor to protect themselves the protection would cost much less money than the money you expend every year for the benefit and protection of the people against the Indians. There is no doubt in the world about it. Arm the frontiermen—discreet men—with muskets and with ammunition, and you will save a great deal in the way of the expense of soldiery. They better understand the Indian character than your soldiers. I do not profess to say that I know anything about Indians. I was once, when I was much younger than I am now, on the plains where Indians were, and, by being chased into camp by them, I learned a little of their character. But if I was to-day to undertake to provide for a defense against the Indian, I would rather arm the settlers who have their life and property at stake and have a greater interest in it than any soldiery. I would rather provide them with arms for defensive purposes than provide a soldiery with arms for that purpose.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States. That bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SARGENT. I have just sent word to the Senator from Nevada, who is detained upon special committee business confided to him by the Senate. I presume he will be here in a moment or two. I trust no vote will be taken adverse to the bill in his absence.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to say that I made the motion yesterday for the purpose of getting time to examine the bill, and as the bill went over I shall withdraw the proposition to recommit at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to recommit is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Railroads as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I yesterday called the attention of the Senator from Nevada to some portions of this bill that I thought were objectionable and I thought needed amendment. I am not certain that the Senator really opposed the suggestions that I made in connection with some portions of his bill, but suggested that if I had any amendments to offer I should present them and the Senate would consider them. I have had but a short time to refer to this bill, but there are some amendments that I wish to suggest which I think will tend to perfect the bill. I want to say in advance that I am not very strongly in favor of the bill even if it shall be amended, and yet if it shall be amended as I believe it should be I am not here to say that I shall oppose it. For one I cannot see the necessity for such a general bill as this; but the Committee on Railroads have examined the bill very carefully; and in view of the Senators composing that committee, on the assurance from them that they have examined it very carefully, I am disposed to withdraw any general objections I may have to such legislation.

I first direct the attention of the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the committee, and also of the Senate, to sections 8 and 9 and to some amendments which I think ought to be made in those sections. In connection with section 8 I suggest whether there is any necessity that there should be one hundred feet on either side of the track of the road for the right of way, whether there is any necessity or any reason for having a greater width in the Territories than ordinarily is given in the States, and whether it is not better to limit that to fifty feet on either side. I believe that is the provision which is found in most of the States, and I believe it would be better to do that.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest then in section 8, line 3, to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty," and the same in line 7 of section 9.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. These amendments will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and they are agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest also, in line 19 of section 9, whether it would not be better to increase the number of commissioners. It says "three commissioners," and I would increase it to six.

Mr. STEWART. It ought to be an odd number. I will make no objection to five.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to make it "five" instead of "three." I move then to strike out "three" and insert "five" in line 19 of section 9.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call the Senator's attention to this clause, beginning in line 16 of section 9:

> And in case the owner or claimant of such lands or premises and such corporation cannot agree as to the damages, the amount shall be determined by the appraisal of five disinterested commissioners—> who shall be appointed upon application by any party to the territorial district court.

As it now stands—

What necessity for these words, "by any party?"

Mr. STEWART. Either party ought to have the right to apply.

Mr. WRIGHT. So it would be if these words were stricken out.

Mr. SARGENT. It might read "any party interested."

Mr. STEWART. I do not think those words are very material.

Mr. WRIGHT. I merely make the suggestion. I will not offer the amendment just now. There are other matters that I think are more important. In line 30 of section 9 I move to strike out the words "full title to" and insert after the word "aforesaid," in line 31, the words "and none other;" and then it will read:

> Which shall thereby acquire the same for the purposes aforesaid and none other.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that amendment, then, to strike out the words "full title to," in line 30, and insert after "aforesaid," in line 31, the words "and none other."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. In lines 36 and 37 of the same section, I move to strike out the words "or given such security as the court may prescribe." As it now reads it is:

But such appeal shall not interfere with the rights of said corporation, after having paid to the clerk the amount of the award, or given such security as the court may prescribe, to enter upon the premises.

The effect of the amendment is to require that they shall pay the money.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to striking out those words.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me suggest to my friend from Iowa whether he does not impair the right of the land-owner by that amendment. I simply suggest it to him. Unless the corporation is required to give security before entering upon the land, if there be an increased award of damages upon the appeal, then the land-owner would have no security for those damages, and the company would be in possession. I submit that before the company should be permitted to enter upon the premises, on taking an appeal, they ought to give security.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the land-owner ought to have a specific lien besides.

Mr. WRIGHT. The difficulty about the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that this is in the alternative, and they may, either by paying the money or giving the security, enter on the land.

Mr. SCOTT. But the Senator will see that in the case of an award from which the company appealed, all they would be required to do would be to pay the money. If the land-owner should appeal, then all the company has to do is to pay him the money, and if the land-owner got a larger award than that from which the company has appealed he has no security for the additional amount.

Mr. WRIGHT. He certainly has under the subsequent provision which requires them to pay the additional award before they acquire this easement. This provision relates alone either to paying money or to giving security before they enter on the land. The object of my amendment is that they shall be required to pay the money, and that giving security shall not be a substitute for paying the money.

Mr. SARGENT. I think I can suggest an amendment that will meet the ideas of both of the Senators, and perhaps make the bill better. I should strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and," and then let what follows read thus:

After having paid to the clerk the amount of the award and given such security as the court may prescribe for any further damage that may be ascertained on appeal.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SARGENT. It requires them to pay the money and give security for further damages.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe there is no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from California.

Mr. STEWART. That certainly covers it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa accepts the amendment suggested by the Senator from California; and the question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I also suggest an amendment to the fortieth line of the same section. It is to strike out all after the word "costs" to and including "parties," in line 43, and insert other words. The section as it stands now reads thus:

And said party appealing shall give bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties, for the payment of any costs that may arise upon such appeal; and in case the party appealing does not obtain a more favorable verdict, such party shall pay the whole cost incurred by both parties.

I move to strike out all after the word "costs," in line 40, to the word "parties," in line 43, and insert:

Or sum that may arise and be adjudged on such appeal, and if the owner of the land shall not recover a larger amount than was awarded by the commissioners, he shall pay the costs of such appeal.

The chairman of the committee will see that as the clause stands, if the railroad company shall appeal, they only give security for the payment of any costs that may arise on the appeal, and there is no security for any increased judgment. Now I propose to insert "or sum" after "costs," so as to read, "for the payment of any costs or sum that may arise and be adjudged;" so as to require them to give surety not only for the costs but for the judgment recovered also.

Mr. STEWART. There is no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then, instead of reading as it stands, "in case the party appealing does not obtain a more favorable verdict, such party shall pay the whole cost incurred by both parties," my proposition is, "And if the owner of the land shall appeal and shall not recover a larger amount than was awarded by the commissioners, he shall pay the costs of such appeal." I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. SARGENT. That seems to be right.

Mr. STEWART. I make no objection. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in section 9 to strike out the following words, from line 40 to line 43:

That may arise upon such appeal; and in case the party appealing does not obtain a more favorable verdict, such party shall pay the whole cost incurred by both parties.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Or sum that may arise or be adjudged upon such appeal, and if the owner of the land shall appeal and shall not recover a larger amount than was awarded by the commissioners, he shall pay the costs of such appeal.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest also in line 34 of section 9, between "sustained" and "but," to insert:

The manner of taking such appeal and the time of hearing the same to be governed by the laws of the Territory regulating appeals from justices of the peace.

The language of that part of the section, as it stands, is this:

And either party feeling aggrieved by said assessment may within thirty days, file—

That is the way it is here. I suppose it should be "take"— an appeal therefrom, and demand a jury of twelve men to estimate the damage sustained; but such appeal shall not interfere with the rights of said corporation.

There is no rule here regulating the manner of taking the appeal or when it is to be heard, and I think there ought to be some provision on that subject.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator's amendment might not operate. There might be a difficulty in the Territories in taking an appeal from the justices of the peace. To what court? The district court. They do not appeal from the justices' courts directly to the Supreme Court. Analogous cases go up to the Supreme Court; and let the matter be regulated the same as it is in other cases. They have similar appeals from the district court to the Supreme Court. An appeal from the justice's court does not get up to the Supreme Court. It goes first to the district court.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that. I am providing for an appeal from this tribunal to the district court. You provide here for appeals from the district court, and now I only provide that it shall be taken under the same rules and regulations as an appeal from a justice's court to the district court, and no rules or regulations are provided in the bill as it stands now.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; that may answer.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear the amendment reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. In some of the Territories they may have no laws that will answer the purpose; for instance, in Utah. They may have no law there by which you can get up a case from a justice's court directly to the district court. I believe it goes to the probate court. There is a good deal of machinery about an appeal there, and this amendment might not operate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that I do not change his section at all. He provides here for an appeal from these commissioners to some tribunal, either the probate court, as in Utah, if that is so, or the district court, or whatever it may be termed in any Territory; but he does not provide how the appeal shall be taken, upon what notice, or at what term of the appellate tribunal it shall be heard. I provide simply that it shall be based exactly on the same ground, the same position as ordinary appeals from a justice's court as to the manner of giving the notice of appeal and the time when it shall be heard.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; that might do.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. In order to carry out the amendment that has already been adopted by the Senate in lines 45 and 46 of section 9, I move to strike out the words "the title of said land and;" and in line 48, after the word "corporation," to insert "and for no other purpose;" so that the clause will read:

Shall be held to vest in said corporation the right to use and occupy the same for the construction, maintaining, and operating of the road of said corporation, and for no other purpose.

A similar amendment has been adopted in another section, and I presume there will be no objection to it here.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now move to strike out all of section 9 after the word "disability," in line 50, and to insert in lieu of the residue of the section the following:

Or in case it shall be necessary for such corporation to enter upon any lands which are unoccupied, and of which there is no apparent owner or claimant, the court may determine the kind of notice to be served on such owner or owners, conforming in all respects, as near as may be, with the laws of said Territory regulating proceedings in real actions; but in all cases it must appear by affidavit or otherwise that notice of said proceedings was sent by mail to such non-resident owner or an excuse shown for not sending the same. In case no claimant shall appear within two years from the time of the opening of said road across any land, all claim to damages against such corporation shall be barred: Provided, That infants, insane persons, and married women, not appearing by themselves or guardians in the proceedings of condemnation, shall have one year after the removal of their disabilities within which to make claim for damages.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Section 11 now reads thus:

That every railroad corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be required to commence operations on the line of its road within one year from the filing of its certificate with the Secretary of the Interior, and thereafter to grade at least ten miles each year, &c.

I move to strike out the word "grade," in line 5, and insert the words "put in operation."

Mr. STEWART. That is too severe. I do not think that will do. That particular point was considered at great length by the committee. For instance, in Montana it was suggested that they could commence grading the roads and do the heavy part of it long before it would be practicable to iron the road; that they could prepare for grading in the cañons, &c., and then make arrangements to get branch roads built. If this ten miles of grading is kept up each year, the committee thought it would be sufficient to prevent a kiting operation, and at the same time give these people an opportunity to maintain their franchise if they continued to do ten miles of that kind of work each year. To put in operation ten miles each year would be almost too much to require of a road organized in that way. Sometimes they do not build more than four or five miles in a year; sometimes the whole length of the road will not be more than four or five miles in the mining districts. It is not desirable to place such restrictions on them as will prevent these enterprises proceeding at all. At the same time I want such requirements as to the work to be done as will show the good faith of the enterprise. If they grade ten miles each year, and have the whole done and laid out in ten years, and do it all with their own money, and with the restrictions in this bill, the committee thought that would be sufficient. The committee discussed this subject a good deal, and that was the deliberate judgment of the committee. However, it is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it is intended by this bill not to provide for the organization in the several Territories of corporations that shall give to the people of the Territories railroads, but merely for the organization of corporations to enter upon the work and do grading without anything more, and allowing them thus to keep in life the corporation, then the provision as it stands is all well enough. But I supposed the committee had in view some practical result; that they expected that these companies would build the roads and give to the people of the Territories railroad facilities, and not that it was intended that they might grade ten miles of road each year and keep on with the grading without ever tieing the road or putting upon it iron or rolling-stock, and thus keep their corporation in life. I supposed they really expected the roads would be built in these Territories. You will see that by this section it is provided:

That every railroad corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall be required to commence operations on the line of its road within one year from the filing of its certificate with the Secretary of the Interior, and thereafter to grade at least ten miles each year, and to complete the whole line of its road in ten years from the date of the filing of said certificate; and if it shall fail to comply with any of the requirements of this section, it shall forfeit its charter and all the rights and privileges conferred by this act as to any uncompleted portion of its line of road.

A company can organize and grade ten miles of road this year, ten miles next year, and ten miles the year after; and there may be another company standing there ready and willing to go on and put down the ties and iron and construct the road actually, and yet this first road stands in the way and prevents their entering upon the enterprise.

Mr. STEWART. We do not want anything of that kind to occur. That point was considered at great length in the committee, and their conclusion will be found in this section. I myself would have preferred all the time that there should be some road built each year. I think ten miles, considering the country where these roads are to be built, is too much. Remember the provision is that you have got to build ten miles each year. You cannot build ten miles one year and then build seven the next; but the work has got to be done each year. I would be willing to say that five miles should be built each year. They might be able to do that. If you would say that they should build "at the rate of ten miles a year," or something of that kind, I would not object to it. I want something done each year until the road is completed. Of course they can build as much more as they please. But I do not wish it to be left so that they may go to a certain distance and stop—go to where the road would pay and then hold the balance without building a portion of the road each year. It would satisfy me to say that five miles shall be built and put in operation each year. To require ten miles would be pretty severe in a mountain country. If they build five miles each year, the road is not going to be held for mere buncombe.

Mr. HAGER. I think the amendment proposed would be rather too harsh, and I would suggest a modification which perhaps will be accepted. In line 5 after the word "grade" I suggest to insert the words "and complete." and in line 6 after the word "complete" to insert the words "and put in operation;" so that it will read:

And thereafter to grade and complete at least ten miles each year, and to complete and put in operation the whole line of its road within ten years.

Mr. STEWART. Ten miles a year! That is rushing it pretty fast.

Mr. HAGER. Not to put in operation, but to grade and complete ten miles a year. It is impossible to put a road in operation unless there is a terminus reached, some point where it is necessary to have commerce. But a road running through an uninhabited Territory at the end of ten miles might have no point where it could do anything. There would be then no object in putting it in operation, but still they could grade the road and lay the rails to that extent. The object of this amendment is to require the building of the road, but not to require it to be put in operation until the whole is completed.

Mr. STEWART. It must be remembered that if they fail to do this work within the time named, there is a forfeiture of the charter as to the uncompleted portion of the road. It seems to me that to require ten miles each year is too much.

Mr. HAGER. The Senator does not understand the amendment proposed. I propose that they shall grade and complete ten miles a year, so far as the road is concerned; that is, grade, put down the superstructure, iron, and so on; but not to put it in operation.

Mr. STEWART. It costs nothing to put it in operation if they have it done, except for a little rolling-stock and a few engines.

Mr. HAGER. I think they ought to forfeit the charter if they do not go on and complete the road.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senate should understand the condition of the country in which most of these roads will be built. It is far beyond the plains. Of course, the Territories are mostly mountainous. The passes are very difficult. The mountain ranges, &c., through which these roads have to be built require stupendous engineering. I suppose the passage of the Sierra Nevada Mountains by the Central Pacific is not more difficult in its ordinary features than the character of the mountains in Montana, Wyoming, Arizona, and other places where these roads will be compelled to pass. They are stupendous engineering operations and will cost immense amounts of money. The grading of ten miles across the Sierra Nevada Mountains required all the resources, all the subsidies of the Government, all the assistance given by the State, and all the capital of the individuals engaged in the undertaking. It was really a very heavy operation. Walls of granite were blown down there as tall as this Capitol, tunnels made a mile in extent, and frequently made; so that the traveler passing along the cars goes through one tunnel, emerges for a short time in the snow-sheds and the sunlight, and rushes into another. All these difficulties are liable to be encountered in the extremely mountainous region which we now call the Territories, and to require them to complete ten miles of line each year would require the company to have enormous capital and very great energy, and to be very exceptional in both respects.

It seems to me that the requirement to grade even ten miles a year is too much; that the bill of the committee requires too much of the companies that will be likely to organize and avail themselves of this provision. Perhaps this matter might be compromised, and also the proposition of the Senator from Iowa be adopted, by requiring a completion say of six miles in each year. The cost of laying the iron is almost nothing compared with the average of grading. The grading must be the very great expense in most of this railroad building, and of course a certain amount of rolling-stock must be put on in order to carry the iron, the ties, or even the workmen after they have built out from some small business center; and then, as they build an additional ten miles, some portion of rolling-stock would be necessary. That would be an operation of the road, and come probably within the spirit of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Of course, if there was business there requiring the operation of the road at a point short of completion, the company would set it in operation for its own profit and benefit. I would suggest an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, that they shall build and complete six miles of road in each year.

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot see why there should be an objection to my amendment. Here is a proposition providing for the organization of corporations in Territories for the building of railroads, long roads as well as short ones. When the railroad company build ten miles they have got to a point—as every person would presume, because the demands of business would require it—where they ought to run their cars; but to leave the bill so as to require them merely to grade the road and to do nothing until the expiration of ten years in the way of running the road and keeping it in life all the time, seems to me to be a most extraordinary proposition. As this bill stands, if they grade ten miles this year, ten miles the next, and ten the year after without putting on a tie or a bar of iron, without running any rolling-stock over it at all, they can keep it in life for ten years. They are required, it is true, to complete their road in ten years, but my proposition is that they shall be required to put in operation ten miles of road each year. Is that an extraordinary amount? It is suggested that they have mountains to go through, that there will be deep cuts and tunnels to be made. Yes; and so there will be places where they can go over plains, where they could build twenty or thirty miles a year.

Mr. STEWART. That would not count. They have got to do so much each year, you know.

Mr. WRIGHT. Exactly; but they can make more than ten miles a year without any trouble in the world in such places as those, and I think ten miles is a very short distance indeed to require them to put their road in operation if they shall hold the line of the road, and thus exclude all other companies who may want to come in and build upon it.

I cannot conceive how it is possible that any person would be content with the building of five miles a year. That seems to me to be trifling with the thing. Then if they put in operation five miles each year they can get the line of road and exclude everybody else, and however much the people may demand that that line shall be occupied by another company, they cannot occupy it. Take the States over and you will find in all the provisions with reference to the organization of railroad companies that they require them to build much more than ten miles of road every year. The Union Pacific Railroad, I believe, was required to build at least twenty miles, and I do not know but more than that. It is true that that was a large and wealthy corporation, but if these organizations are to be for any practical purpose, they ought to be required to do something, and not merely to go there and grade the road and leave it for ten years and at the end of ten years complete their road. It seems to me that ten miles is a very short distance, and that to require them to put in operation that distance every year is very reasonable. I shall, therefore, insist on the a mendment as it stands.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the amendment will not be adopted in its present form. It will be observed that it requires them to build this amount in each year, and when they get to the plains, although they might build fifty miles in one year there, they have got to build ten miles the next year and keep it up each year. I would prefer it in that shape, to require something to be done each year, because if something is not required to be done each year, they might build to a good point and then reserve the rest of the road. If you require them to build ten miles each year, very frequently there will be ten miles that they cannot very well build in a year without distressing themselves, and by making the provisions of your bill so hard, you will discourage these enterprises altogether. I would be willing to say five miles; but if you go beyond that, the bill will be of no use except they happen to get upon a level line where they can build ten miles in a year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to propound an inquiry. I have been listening to this debate for a few moments. When a road is partially constructed, is there anything in this bill that will prevent any other company, in case the first company do not progress rapidly enough, from organizing and placing a road alongside in the same direction?

Mr. STEWART. Not at all. On the contrary, there is a provision in the bill directly providing for that; a provision that where they go through defiles, the other road may come along and have the right of way to go through also, to prevent anything of the kind the Senator seems to apprehend.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that answers the fear suggested by the Senator from Iowa. If they had a monopoly or got any exclusive privilege, so that another company, if they unnecessarily delayed the building of the road, could not step in and construct alongside of them, then I should think there was force in the objection of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WRIGHT. The trouble about that is this: in the country through which many of these roads will run, the first company that is organized and has the right of way will of course get through the passes and defiles that are most desirable.

Mr. STEWART. No; that is provided for.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not read the bill, but I understand that is provided for; that in that case both companies have the same right. I do not want a monopoly.

Mr. HAGER. The Senator will find that provided for in section 10.

Mr. STEWART. Here it is:

SEC. 10. That any such corporation whose right of way, or whose track upon such right of way, extends through any cañon, pass, or defile, shall not exclude any other such corporation from a passage through the same upon equitable terms; and in case of disagreement, upon application of either of the parties, the same shall be adjusted by the Secretary of the Interior, after hearing, upon reasonable notice to the parties, whose decision may be enforced by a court of competent jurisdiction; and if the passage of any such railroad through any cañon, pass, or defile causes the disuse or change of location of any public wagon-road, damages shall be awarded therefor as provided by this act.

Where one company is formed there is nothing to prevent another company being formed over the same line, leaving them fifty feet wide on each side for the right of way; and if they come to a cañon and it is necessary to get the same right of way, they can do it.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the Senator understand this section to authorize the new company that may be organized to pass over the line of road through the cañon that may be constructed by the first company?

Mr. STEWART. If it becomes necessary in order to get through it.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then the language ought to be changed.

Mr. STEWART. No; it is right as it is.

Mr. WRIGHT. In section 19, line 7, I move to strike out the following words:

To the United States by any act of Congress, nor to lands upon which any homestead or pre-emption claims may exist at the time of filing the certificate of incorporation under the provisions of this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

For any purpose by any act of Congress; nor shall lands upon which pre-emption or homestead claims exist at the time of the actual location of the road be included in such grant.

Mr. STEWART. There is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. In section 13, line 5, after the word "parties," I move to insert the words "not to exceed 10 per cent. per annum." As it is now these corporations may borrow money at a rate of interest to be agreed upon by the respective parties, and I propose to add "not to exceed 10 per cent. per annum."

Mr. STEWART. I will not object to that limitation; but I do not suppose they would build a railroad on money as high as that. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps it would be better not to put it in as high as 10 per cent. To pay that rate of interest would ruin any road. If there is to be any limitation, I would suggest 8 per cent.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection in the world. I will say "not to exceed 8 per cent. per annum."

Mr. STEWART. I prefer that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well; I am very glad to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. In section 16, line 6, after the words "notice to," I move to insert the words "and with the approval of;" so that the section will read:

Giving public notice in one or more newspapers in the Territory having the lagest circulation, and notice to, and with the approval of, the Secretary of the Interior, of such establishment or change.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now move to strike out the twenty-first section.

The Chief Clerk read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

SEC. 21. That the right of way through the unoccupied public lands of the United States in any State is hereby granted to any railroad corporation incorporated under the laws of such State to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the center of such railroad; and the right and authority are hereby given to such corporation to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material of earth, stone, timber, and water for the construction and maintenance thereof; and ground for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations is hereby granted to such of said corporations as have not received aid in lands or bonds from the United States, not to exceed forty acres for each ten miles of road hereafter to be constructed, subject to the restrictions of section 19 of this act.

Mr. STEWART. Before the question is put on striking out the section, I will move an amendment to perfect the section. I think we certainly ought to give them a mere right of way fifty feet in width over the stray sections of public land that may happen to be in the States. There cannot possibly be any reason for their coming here to get bills of that sort passed. Since they have quit begging land grants, they come here asking for the right of way to build over sections belonging to the Government of the United States. I would suggest, in the fourth line of the section, to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty," so as to make it correspond with the other portions of the bill, and then I would strike out all of the section after the word "railroad," in the fifth line.

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot accept that amendment; and if it should be adopted I shall still object to the section and still insist on striking it out. I do not propose that on this bill providing for the organization of corporations in the Territories we shall attach a section that shall give to any and every railroad company that may be organized, without any reference whatever to their ability to construct or work the road, the right and power to go through the public lands in the States. I do not propose to do any such thing, and I see no necessity for having that in this bill. If the Senator from Nevada has prepared his bill with a view of obviating special legislation here from time to time on the subject of railroads in the Territories, let him adhere to that, and not put a provision here that extends the power of a railroad company in reference to public lands, and when we ought to be required to act upon each individual case. I think it would be better for the Senator's bill to strike out that section entirely. It is not at all material to, or connected with, the general purpose of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. That section is not a favorite of mine; but I see no harm in giving the right of way over the public lands of the United States. I care very little about the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the twenty-first section.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I presume the object of this bill is what is stated—a general act for the purpose of permitting railway companies to become incorporated in the Territories of the United States, and that is all. I take it for granted that there is no other object in the bill. It is simply meant to provide for the association of capital for the construction of railways. Section 14 of the bill, as was pointed out yesterday by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] contains capacities for the formation of land companies upon an unlimited scale. That is in no way necessarily germane to the professed object of this bill. Section 14 provides:

That such corporation—

And you are aware that "such corporation" means any body of five men—

such corporation may acquire by purchase or gift any lands in the vicinity of its road or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way, or such as may be donated to aid in the construction of such road, and convey the same in such manner as the directors may prescribe; and all deeds and conveyances made by such corporation shall be signed by the president under the seal of the corporation.

There can be little doubt under the language of this section, constructed as it is in the disjunctive in every case, that an unlimited power to acquire and dispose of real estate is granted to any corporation which may be organized under the very broad terms of this act. I cannot conceive that the country is prepared to establish these crédits fonciers, these real-estate associations, in the Territories of the United States; nor is there anything in the language of this section which is not superfluous when the other sections of the bill are considered. The right of way is given; the right of purchasing, for the purpose of construction, stone, land, other materials, and all matters necessary to the road on the line is given by previous sections, and this section 14 would, I think, at the hands of any court, receive the construction which I have stated.

Mr. STEWART. I do not attach the slightest importance to that section.

Mr. BAYARD. If there is no importance attached to it, I move that section 14 be stricken out.

Mr. STEWART. This section was inserted at the suggestion of some of the territorial Delegates. The idea of it was that the people might desire to donate land to a road in order to aid it. I do not think there is any importance in the section. I think perhaps it would be as well to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. RAMSEY in the chair.) The Senator from Delaware moves to strike out the fourteenth section.

Mr. HAGER. I move to amend the motion to strike out the whole section by striking out so much as follows the word "way" in line 4, so that it will read:

That such corporation may acquire by purchase or gift any lands in the vicinity of its road, or through which the same may pass, so far as may be convenient or necessary to secure the right of way.

That portion of the section the Senator may not object to. The latter clause, I presume, is that which is objectionable; but lines 1, 2, 3, and part of the fourth line to the word "way" cannot be. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "way" in line 4, instead of striking out the entire section. If the Senator will look at the section, perhaps he will accept the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir; I consider that the section, if it has any meaning, has the meaning and effect which I have indicated. The power here given is not essential for the construction of a road; it is a power of taking title and conveying title to real estate, of dealing in real estate, which is in no way germane to the objects of the corporation. This is a bill of vast scope. I did not propose in moving this amendment to express my views on the bill at large; but it is a bill of vast scope, affecting a territory almost equal in extent to the present organized States of the Union; and this by a single act is to affect the policy of those future States, and affect their internal policy in a manner that I consider exceedingly questionable. If it shall be found to be the pleasure of the Senate to pass any general law authorizing the incorporation of railway companies through this vast extent of land, let them at least confine it to railway purposes, and not under the guise of creating railway corporations or facilitating the creation of those corporations, set up great landed associations.

If the amendment of the Senator from California, so far as I could understand it owing to the distance from which he spoke, would be to confine this section to mere rights of way, I have to say that all that is provided for by other sections; and the section either is entirely superfluous or it is in the wrong direction, and, therefore, I prefer to insist upon my original motion that the entire section be stricken from the bill. If that is voted down, perhaps amendments may follow that may bring it nearer to the sense of the Senate; but as the Senator from Nevada has stated it was not his intent, and I do not believe it was his intent, to do more than have a general act authorizing the creation of railways and not to have land companies in the Territories, I trust my motion may remain undisturbed and unaffected by the amendatory motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it seems to me that this section 14 is open to the objections stated by myself yesterday and by the Senator from Delaware to-day; and it strikes me further that the words proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from California would all be supplied by the common law. I understand now that the Senator proposes to withdraw his amendment; if so, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HAGER. On reflection I will withdraw the amendment I proposed. I think the section had better be stricken out. It really constitutes a corporation with powers to buy and sell lands; in fact making one corporation within another, a land corporation within a railroad corporation. I think in that respect the section is objectionable. It is not a necessary part of this bill, and it ought not to be a part of the bill. It is unnecessary to the construction of a road, and so far as the Government is concerned this is but a concession on the part of the Government of the right of way through the Territories to certain parties to build railroads.

Mr. STEWART. I would suggest to my friend from California that I think in the ninth section all the power he suggests is granted. They have there the right to purchase the right of way.

Mr. HAGER. I see that that is so, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I think all the Senator requires is in the ninth section. The real object of this was to allow persons to donate their private land to aid a corporation in building a railway, but I do not think it is well to mix up that question with the bill.

Mr. HAGER. The object of the bill, as I understand it, is simply to obtain a concession from the Government of the right of way to construct railroads in the Territories. It is no part, and ought not to be a part, of this law to create a corporation to buy and sell lands.

Mr. STEWART. Not at all.

Mr. HAGER. Therefore I think the whole section had better be stricken out, and I withdraw the amendment I proposed, and will favor the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, to strike out the fourteenth section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I move to amend the eighth section in the last line by substituting "ten acres" for "forty acres." If the grant of forty acres is intended as a subsidy, it is too small. If it is intended for the purposes specified in the section, namely, for "station buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations," it is too large. If the forty acres chance to be very valuable, the Government ought not to give it to the corporation; if it is not specially valuable the corporation can afford to buy it. I therefore move to substitute "ten" for "forty."

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it is too much once in ten miles to allow a railroad company to have the least legal subdivision, forty acres, for the purposes of depots, turn-outs, &c., in these Territories where four-fifths of the land is a desert. I am sure such a grant will not injure this country particularly. I do not think it will do any great harm. If anybody thinks it will, I am willing he shall vote it out.

Mr. PRATT. I should be glad if my friend from Nevada will state whether ten acres is not as good as forty for the purpose specified in this section, namely, the use of station-buildings, workshops, depots, &c.

Mr. STEWART. Ten acres in each ten miles? I should think not. These local roads through a mining country will want perhaps two or three depots in the course of ten miles. I do not think forty acres will be of any great value to the railroad; but still it is the lowest amount that has been in any bill. It is the amount that was finally adopted in both Houses. We took the lowest amount, forty acres, and all the special bills have had at least this much.

Mr. CLAYTON. I concur with the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. It seems to me that ten acres is amply sufficient for the purposes of any railway company in carrying on its business, and that this forty-acre donation in every ten miles would result in the major portion of the forty acres being laid out into town lots and the railway company would in that way enter into the business of a town-lot speculator. I am satisfied from my experience in railroad transactions that ten acres is amply sufficient for all the transactions of any railroad. It may not be at the termini, but along the line of the road, I think that much land is amply sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I think ten acres is ample, and rather more than ample.

Mr. STEWART. Put it "ten" then.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend in section 7, line 6, by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting "sixty." That is the notice necessary to be given for the opening of books of subscription to the stock. It seems to me that in the distant Territories sixty days is little enough.

Mr. STEWART. There is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move also to amend the bill in the same section, line 19, by striking out the words "each share shall entitle the owner to one vote, and a majority of votes cast shall be necessary to a choice," and inserting:

In all elections for directors of any corporation organized under the provisions of this act each shareholder shall be entitled to cast for each director to be elected one vote for each share of stock held by him, or may, at his option, cast the whole number of his votes for one candidate or distribute them upon two or more candidates, as he may prefer; and the candidates corresponding in number to the directors to be elected receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected.

Mr. President, this amendment speaks for itself. The object of it is to allow minority representation in the board of directors. It is well known that under the ordinary provisions of these incorporation laws a bare majority of the stockholders are enabled to obtain possession of the organization, and once having obtained possession of the organization, by issuing to themselves stock in various ways, by making contracts, &c., they are able to perpetuate themselves forever. It seems to me that the minority of the stockholders ought to be protected; that we ought to throw guards around their interests, for the majority can protect themselves. It seems to me no more than fair that we should enable the minority to have at least one director upon every board of directors to watch the proceedings of the majority of the board. I do not see why any objection can be made to this amendment. Certainly a respectable minority ought to be enabled to ascertain through a director what is going on in the board of directors.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it worth while to try this experiment of minority representation in corporations in the Territories. The committee have attempted to guard against issuing of fraudulent stock and all sorts of kiting. In the first place they cannot increase the capital stock, and no stock can be issued except on money paid in. Then before issuing stock an installment of 10 per cent. on each share must be paid in money at the time of subscription, and the residue paid in such installments not exceeding 10 per cent. on each share of stock as the directors may prescribe. The stock must be paid in in money, not by contracts or anything else.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am aware that the corporation under this act cannot increase the capital stock, but it does not necessarily follow that they shall issue the entire capital stock on their organization. They are only required to have subscribed 10 per cent. of the stock, and they may from time to time continue to issue this stock. They can organize on 10 per cent., and, if I am correctly informed, they can go on with their organization from year to year. Then they may continue, by making contracts, &c., to issue this stock. It is a well-known fact that the great objection raised against these incorporations all over the country is, that a bare majority of a few men on the inside, a combination, may obtain possession of the organization and perpetuate their possession by issuing to themselves, or to some other parties with whom they have an understanding to vote for their directors, stock under contracts. All this amendment provides for is that a respectable minority of the stockholders may be enabled to have at least one director in the board who may watch their interests and see that they are not "squeezed out," to use a common term.

This is not an idea of my own, Mr. President. I am very free to confess that I have obtained this idea from the constitution lately adopted by the people of Pennsylvania. This whole question of railroad corporations is one that has excited a great deal of public interest; the legislation in regard to it is being perfected day by day in the States that have had reason to put these corporations into existence. The State of Pennsylvania in its recent constitution has provided for this very thing, and I think very wisely too. If we are going to pass this bill—and I think we ought to pass it; I sympathize with its general provisions—we ought to throw all the safeguards we can around the stockholders who are to pay their money and subscribe to the stock of these companies. I did not expect that the Senator who had charge of the bill would make any objection to the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I do not intend to make any. The question is for the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (to Mr. STEWART.) Give it up; and try the question in the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. No; I cannot. I think this system of cumulative voting is an experiment which as yet has not worked anywhere. I should like to see some place where it has worked well. In Pennsylvania they have got into confusion by it. I do not want to destroy this bill by a machine that will not work. I am afraid it is an element of discord, without any practical good.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think this simply affords an opportunity to the minority to watch the majority; and if they find them through fraudulent contracts issuing to themselves stock, they can then go into the courts and stop it. The difficulty is, as corporations are nowadays managed, a majority of stockholders, with their own men in the directory and no person there to watch them, do illegal acts in the way of issuing stock; and no one knows it until it is too late to check it.

Mr. STEWART. But we have provided that there shall be a statement each year setting forth all the items with great elaboration in this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. You have not even provided that the books shall be open for the inspection of the stockholders. There is not a word on that subject. You have not even provided that the books of the company shall be open to the inspection of the stockholders.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Arkansas says he has obtained this idea of introducing minority representation in corporations from the new constitution of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to him that so far as that is a practical question, that constitution went into effect only in January last——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to Senators that the vote last taken disclosed the want of a quorum, and the Chair by count ascertaining that to be the fact, no further business can be done, and debate is not in order.

Mr. SCOTT. If there is nobody present in the Chamber I have nobody to talk to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to a full Senate when one can be had.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he demand the yeas and nays upon his amendment, and that will disclose whether we have a quorum or not.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SCOTT. If the roll-call shall disclose a quorum present, will further debate then be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only way debate could proceed then would be on a motion to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment if it should be adopted. The roll will be called.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Ingalls, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Mitchell, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, and Stewart—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, West, and Windom—34.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend in section 16 by striking out the following words, commencing in line 1:

That such corporation shall as soon as convenient after its organization establish a principal office at some point on the line of its road.

And in lieu thereof inserting:

Every railroad corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall maintain an office at some point on the line of its road, where transfers of its stock shall be made, and where its books shall be kept for inspection by any stockholder or creditor of such corporation, in which shall be recorded the amount of capital stock subscribed or paid in, and by whom; the names of the owners of its stock; and the amounts owned by them respectively; and transfers of said stock, and the names and places of residence of its officers.

This amendment speaks for itself.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BAYARD. I am disposed to approve of the amendment now offered; and it affords me an opportunity of pointing out to the friends of this measure a difficulty which is to my mind insuperable. Here is a general law proposing a scheme of railway incorporation for all the Territories of the United States. The language used in the bill is "that any number of natural persons not less than five may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States."

That means within any and all of those organized communities known to the laws of this country as Territories. The organized Territories of the United States are now ten in number. They embrace an area superior, or, if not superior, fully equal to the territory within the constituted States of the Union. In due course of time, in the progress of settlement, these Territories will be carved into States, and will apply for admission as sovereign and independent States into the Union. What then is to become of this general law, and what is to be the effect of its operations when that which is intended for a whole comes to be applied separately to each part? Do not Senators perceive the necessary confusion of attempting to legislate for this body of fellow-citizens whose communities now are in a territorial condition and to legislate for them as a whole, when presently they will be subdivided into States, the jurisdiction of each State being confined to its own territorial limits?

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The question has frequently arisen in the organization of new States as to what should be done with existing corporations within their limits, and it has been solved by provisions in their constitutions generally. There is no difficulty about that. These companies will be in no worse condition than corporations organized under territorial laws, which were liable to great abuse.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, Mr. President, there will be very great and there are very apparent difficulties in the way. There is a difficulty in my opinion insuperable in considering this measure. Such a law as this cannot, in my opinion, be draughted without creating the jurisdictional difficulties to which I have referred, which must arise hereafter when those communities assume the autonomy of States and control their questions of taxation. Other kindred questions must necessarily be decided by themselves.

Mr. STEWART. The Pacific Railroad bill raised the same question. That road was built under a charter from Congress through Territories two of which have since become States, and the jurisdiction of the States over the railroad is the same as if it had been organized in any other way.

Mr. BAYARD. No such law as this has ever passed Congress, and I think that the radical defect of the bill is in attempting to make a general law for a class of territorial governments which are States in embryo, soon to become States, and when they are States to necessarily assume the functions of sovereignty belonging to States.

There are in several States of this Union, and notably in the State of Pennsylvania—and having the statutes of that State before me I will make reference to them—general laws providing for railway incorporations. In Pennsylvania their general law is guarded expressly; first, by the provisions of the State constitution. Now what does the constitution of Pennsylvania provide in respect to all corporations? That the charter shall be revocable at the will of the Legislature. It is a provision of the late constitution of Pennsylvania so overwhelmingly adopted by her people; and it is one of those provisions which the spirit of the times and which the sense of the people of Pennsylvania, shared by them in common with the sense of all the other peoples in this country, demand, that there should be a limit put upon legislative power for the perpetual creation of corporations. In the State in which I live there has always been a restrictive power upon the Legislature in regard to corporations; that, in the first place, no corporation not for public improvement should have a longer charter than for twenty years, and it required a two-thirds vote of the Legislature; and that no corporation, whether for public improvement or otherwise, should ever have a charter granted that should not be revocable by any succeeding Legislature. This is the constitution of Indiana, as I understand; it is so in Pennsylvania; and it should be so in every State. It certainly should be so in this law; and yet we are legislating for communities which, as I stated, are as yet but States in embryo, without having the power to fix their policies in respect to this most important matter.

Mr. President, we have had enough and more than enough of corporate power in the United States. Its shadows are seen in every Legislature in the land; and they are seen oftentimes in the Halls of Congress. I do not desire to see any further permission given for their extension over these new communities whose people have no voice whatever in the distribution of the powers which we propose to make for them. Why, sir, this bill contains no restriction, no requirement as to the citizenship of any of the five men who are to form a railroad corporation in any or in all the Territories of the United States.

Mr. President, the theory originally was that these franchises granted to corporations were part of the public property; and that the only justification for granting them to individuals, many or few, was the public benefit, not the benefit of the adventurers who chose to put their money in the schemes of improvement; but the theory of public grants is public benefit; you make the grant to benefit the public, and not to benefit those to whom you carve out a portion of the eminent domain of the State and intrust public power. That theory seems to have been totally lost sight of by those who assume these franchises and undertake to operate under them until the contrary opinion seems to prevail, that grants of public franchises are for the benefit of those who take them. That is a sad error; and it is one which I think has brought much trouble upon this country; and I am glad that our judicial decisions now are beginning to return to the great fundamental principle that these being public franchises must be granted for public benefit and carried out for public benefit alone.

Where in this bill is provided the protection which every community ought to have that the corporators, the directors, the trustees of these franchises so granted, shall be citizens or residents of the community where the work is to be carried on? There is not a prudent Legislature known to me which in granting charters to railroad companies or any other desirable association does not provide that a number of directors, sometimes a majority, sometimes the whole, always a considerable part, shall be residents and citizens of the State. Why? Because the bestowal of such a franchise is a grant of public trust. The character of a State is oftentimes involved in the use made by parties of the franchises of the State. Take the question in old times of the chartering of a bank. Did you give it to any adventurer, some characterless fellow whose only idea was to get the name of a bank, issue paper, get circulation out, and then pack up his trunks and run away, leaving no one to answer? Such things are not granted by careful and cautious Legislatures. They have been venally granted, and the result has been disgrace to the public franchises of States. When a Legislature undertakes to part with part of the public power in the shape of public franchises, it is in my opinion the bounden, conscientious duty of the men who vote for those laws to know into what manner of men's hands those powers are going. And yet this bill does not provide for any citizenship or residence. These five men may live in Turkey; they may live in Asia Minor; they may live on the coast of Congo; you may get five names and you may have a railroad five hundred miles long incorporated by them with all the vast powers contained in this bill; and then what else arises? It is not simply necessary that you have that guarantee which personal character does and ought to give to enterprises; not simply that you have the grantee of this power living in your midst and subject to your laws and amenable to your jurisdiction but this bill nowhere provides any means by which process shall be served upon these corporations or what shall constitute a service upon them.

Think of so loosely drawn a bill on so very important a subject, not affecting a single State like Pennsylvania, but affecting that which may become the seat of twenty States like Pennsylvania, each her equal in extent, in wealth, and in population, as compared with the Pennsylvania statute of which I have spoken! What safeguard is there given by this bill that is given by the statute of Pennsylvania? In 1868 an act was passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania permitting the free incorporation of railways in that State. First, it provided that—

Any number of citizens of Pennsylvania, not less than nine—

There is the first important provision; it is confined to her own people—may form a company for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad for public use in the conveyance of persons and property, or for the purpose of maintaining and operating any unincorporated railroad already constructed for like public use; and for that purpose may make and sign articles of association, in which shall be stated the name of the company—

There is no such provision in this bill—

the number of years the same is to continue—

I believe that is stated here at fifty years.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Delaware has overlooked the fact that section 2 requires the certificate to state "first, the name of such corporation, by which it shall be known."

Mr. BAYARD. Then I was mistaken as to that detail. I only have been able to read the bill in a cursory manner; but in looking over the Pennsylvania statute I became aware of many safeguards in which the present bill is totally deficient. Let me go on. It requires:

The number of years the same is to continue; the places from and to which the road is to be constructed or maintained and operated; the length of such road as near as may be, and the name of each county in the State through or into which it is made or intended to be made; the amount of the capital stock of the company, which shall not be less than $10,000 for every mile of road constructed or proposed to be constructed, and the number of shares of which said capital stock shall consist; and the names and places of residence of a president and not less than six nor more than twelve directors of the company, who shall manage its affairs for the first year and until others are chosen in their places. Each subscriber to such articles of association shall subscribe thereto his name, place of residence, and the number of shares of stock he agrees to take in said company. On compliance with the provisions of the second section of this supplement, such articles of association shall be acknowledged by at least three of the directors before some officer competent to take acknowledgments of deeds in the county where the principal office is designed to be located, and may be filed in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, who shall indorse thereon the day on which they were filed, and record the same in a book to be provided by him for that purpose; and thereupon—

It provides they shall become invested with "the powers and privileges following, to wit."

It then proceeds to give them the usual corporate existence and powers for the purpose of the transaction of the business of a railroad company. Section 2 provides that—

Such articles of association shall not be filed and recorded in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth until at least $9,000 of stock for every mile of railroad proposed to be made is subscribed thereto, and 10 per cent. paid thereon, in good faith and in cash, to the directors named in said articles of association; nor until there is indorsed thereon or annexed thereto an affidavit, made by at least three of the directors named in said articles, that the amount of stock required by this section has been in good faith subscribed, and 10 per cent. paid in cash thereon as aforesaid; and that it is intended in good faith to construct or to maintain and operate the road mentioned in such articles of association, which affidavit shall be recorded with the articles of association as aforesaid.

Note how many of these safeguards were required by the State of Pennsylvania, where I am sure it will not be doubted that the railroad companies have their full share of influence, before this general law was permitted to pass. We can amend the present bill, and I do not know that objection would be made to providing that the capital stock shall not be less than $10,000 per mile. That is the minimum at which any road could be built anywhere, and in the average of these Territories that would be very far below the necessary average cost of a railroad. See how differently this bill is drawn. In the first place, it permits five instead of nine to form a company; no citizenship, no residence, no actual identity is even required of these five anybodies who may become a corporation. It does not confine them to any Territory, but lets them roam at large through all the Territories of the United States, leading, as I said, hereafter to inevitable collision as to jurisdiction of taxation between these Territories when they shall have grown into States. Further:

That any number of persons as aforesaid, associating to form a corporation for the purposes named in the first section of this act, shall, under their hands and seals, make a certificate, which shall specify as follows: First, the name of such corporation, by which it shall be known; secondly, the name of the county or counties and Territory or Territories where the termini of said road are to be located, and the county or counties and Territory or Territories through which such road shall pass, and the general route of said road.

The length of the road is not there stated, and yet that is essential in order to ascertain, as will be presently seen, the proper amount of subscription, and also to affect a subsequent section of this very bill, which requires so much to be built a year, and the whole road to be completed within a certain time.

Thirdly, the amount of capital stock necessary to construct such road, which amount so specified shall not be increased without the consent of Congress.

"The amount of capital stock" I suppose is another phrase for "the number of shares of capital stock;" but there is no mode fixed there of the amount of capital stock for each mile of road. The difference necessarily is very essential. My friend shakes his head. If it be not essential what is the use of talking about your per centum? How can you know what to subscribe to obtain a per centum on until you know what is to be the whole cost? If you have at least $10,000 per mile and your road is one hundred miles long, then you know it will require $1,000,000 for the capital stock, and you must have upon that a cash subscription actually paid in of 10 per cent.; but if you have not these data in your law of incorporation, how can you know the amount that shall be subscribed or how shall you know the number of shares of capital stock unless you shall have what this law does not require to be stated?

I confess, Mr. President, that I do not see how this bill can be amended to avoid the objections that I have stated. I do not see how Congress can pass a law creating these single corporations which are to exist in independent jurisdictions, each of which necessarily ought to have control over the works within its midst. We all know that we have railway companies running through two or three or more States and subsisting in each State under the separate authority of that State, and yet by permission of all the States consolidated and existing, for all intents and purposes, as a single corporation; but when those corporations come before the courts of the United States or before the courts of the States, they are treated as separate corporations in each State. The power of taxation by each State has been lately and most distinctly and frequently affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Corporations, such as are here proposed, would be an anomaly in our system—corporations created by Congress and running through two, three, four, or perhaps half a dozen different communities, now called Territories, but which we may soon expect to become States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not this bill provide that when these Territories become States all these charters shall be subject to State legislation?

Mr. BAYARD. That is the difficulty with the present act. It proposes by a single charter to enable a company to be formed of any five persons which shall operate in all the Territories of the United States. Now I say that hereafter, when these present Territories, which I have termed States in embryo, shall come to be admitted into the Union, they will find corporations in their midst which will be beyond their control, having been pre-existing under congressional authority, and with no power of revocation vested in the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My inquiry was whether this bill—I have not looked at it—did not contain a provision which declares that whenever any of these Territories shall become a State, that State shall have supreme control over the corporation to the extent of its total abolition if it likes?

Mr. BAYARD. That would do, and that would create separate corporations in each State. But this bill contains no such provision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to.

Mr. BAYARD. Although I state most frankly that I cannot see how we can now under this bill create a practical, useful corporation which shall be subject hereafter in that way, I will propose to change the phraseology. I recognize the argument of convenience of thus blessing the whole barrel of pork at once instead of saying grace over every single meal which my friend from Nevada so objects to, by passing this wholesale system of incorporation without any regard to the wishes or the feelings or the interests of these Territories. I only say, and I say it in a very friendly spirit and not desiring to interfere with legislation, that I do not see but this bill can be made practically to work beneficially.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to my friend from Delaware, if I do not interrupt him, that it is within my recollection that within a year or two we had exactly this question up, not as to a sweeping corporation but as to some railway corporation, some right that was to be granted to a corporation in a Territory of some kind, where it was suggested and agreed to on all hands that we ought to provide that when that Territory should become a State we should not saddle upon her a corporation that should be paramount to her sovereignty, and that the corporation should take whatever right we should give to it, subject to the supreme power of the State when there should be one.

Mr. BAYARD. That was precisely the provision; and it illustrates my idea in a single case. But here is something that far surpasses anything that has heretofore been proposed; and I say most frankly that this is to me an insuperable objection. With constant objections arising I do not see how a practicable bill can be framed out of this.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me a minute at that point? Or I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. BAYARD. I am stating quite unpremeditatedly my objections to this measure. I say frankly that although I shall probably vote against this bill for broad and general reasons which I have not yet adverted to, I am quite willing to give any aid I can to make it as unobjectionable as possible. If it is to become a law, I prefer it to be as guarded as we can make it. Therefore I do not wish to be misunderstood in what I say. I do not propose to amend it in a way to make it objectionable; on the contrary, I propose to make it more acceptable to my views and bring it as near right as I can, although I fear in the end it will not be sufficiently so to enable me to vote for it. Now if in the first section——

Mr. STEWART. Before you go on proposing amendments, I should like to reply to the main difficulty of the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. The difficulty that the Senator from Delaware suggests (and it is very proper for consideration) I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to. Here is a general system of railway incorporation for the Territories; that is, a free railroad law allowing the people to incorporate themselves and build railroads with their own money. That is the intention. It is said that difficulties may arise when they become States on account of the jurisdiction. Now, in the first place, we have prohibited the Territories from passing acts incorporating railroads. In 1867 we passed an act, one section of which is as follows:

> The Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories of the United States shall not, after the passage of this act, grant private charters or special privileges; but may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies-corporate for mining, agricultural, and industrial interests.

Not including railroads.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it the construction that not being mentioned they are therefore excluded?

Mr. STEWART. It has been so construed. Some attempted to incorporate railroad companies, but capitalists would not invest, and the opinions of the best lawyers are that that permission does not include railroads.

Mr. BAYARD. The construction is that the expression of certain things excludes all others.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir. Now it will be admitted in the first instance that it is not desirable to prevent people in the Territories from building railroads. I believe my friend from Delaware will go with me thus far, that they ought to have in some way the privilege of building railroads. Then we come to the question if there is any possible way of allowing them to build railroads at all without raising the identical point suggested by him, to wit, that the railroad may be found hereafter to be partly in two or more States. Suppose you should authorize the territorial Legislature to grant these charters, would not the same thing happen? The States are seldom formed of the same exact boundaries that the Territories are. The railroad would be very likely to be found in two States when the Territories become States, if it was built under a territorial charter. Suppose Congress itself should by a special act grant a charter to a railroad within a Territory and subsequently should admit it as a State, the same question would be raised. So there is no possible way of framing a law to build railroads, not knowing where the future State lines will be, so that they may not be in two different States, whether those acts are passed by the territorial Legislature or by Congress.

The act of 1867 prohibiting the Territories from organizing railroad corporations was certainly wise, for they were granting franchises most improvidently, and if their laws had been sanctioned every cañon and defile in the country would have been monopolized; there would have been somebody without capital standing there in the way of legitimate enterprises. Almost all of their charters had exclusive privileges. The legislation was such that Congress felt called upon to stop it altogether, and not only to stop it but to prevent any special grants of any kind. After we did that, what was the result? They came to Congress with their bills. Of the bills presented nearly nineteen-twentieths of them—and there were several hundred presented—were for roads going through several Territories; and some have been passed going through a good many Territories; for instance one goes from Ogden, or the neighborhood of Ogden, through to Oregon. It goes through the Territories of Utah and Idaho; I do not know whether it crosses the line of Montana or not; and then it goes into Washington Territory and through it to the State of Oregon. We passed that the last session. There you have got one under a special charter which will raise the same question when there shall be different States ultimately on that line. You have all the vice in that of special legislation and getting privileges here that are unguarded. The Senator talks about the want of guards in this bill. He ought to look at the special bills which go through every day without notice. It is to prevent this special legislation which is so injurious that we have attempted to frame this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. My friend from Nevada constantly refers to the phrase "special legislation."

Mr. STEWART. I mean special legislation in such cases as I have just cited.

Mr. BAYARD. But then there is in the nature of incorporations always special legislation. It is not a subject, in my opinion, for general legislation. Special legislation is vicious where it is legislation varying from general principles, being not a general law affecting the whole community, but a special law affecting a part. I think that is the explanation of the term "special" or "general," but an act of incorporation cannot be termed special legislation. It is an exercise of power which in its very nature must be single; it is not to be made by a general rule; it is the delegation of a certain portion of the public power and right.

Mr. STEWART. That is just where we differ. I call it special legislation, and of the most vicious character, to come here for charters and slip them through without having them particularly guarded, to be sold out, which is the necessary result of this whole thing if you do not provide for the subject by general law. I say where general laws can effect the purpose, it ought to be accomplished by general laws, and the building of railroads ought to be as free as air; and every man who is willing to put in his money should have the same right that any other man has; and Congress should let them all build. This is easily susceptible of general regulations. There is no difficulty about it. The States have adopted general regulations, and they are avoiding a great deal of this special legislation. In every State where a general law has been tried it has been regarded as a great deal better than getting through particular bills for particular railroads with special privileges. Every State that has tried the plan of having it done by general laws, finds it a great deal better than by special laws.

Now as to the point that there will be trouble on account of these Territories becoming States hereafter. I say that point is not well taken. Take the Pacific Railroad. When that charter was granted it went through Nebraska and Nevada, which are now States and were then Territories. They have become States since, and the Supreme Court, in a case that went up from Nebraska, held that Nebraska had the same rights of taxation as if that road had not been organized under a law of Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. Was there not a special act passed by Congress, which the Senator from Vermont referred to in regard to that very railroad?

Mr. STEWART. Nothing as to State jurisdiction.

Mr. BAYARD. At the time of the organization of that road was there not an express reservation of this power over it?

Mr. STEWART. No special reservation about it. In this bill Congress does make a special reservation:

> Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of such corporations, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

When a State applies for admission this arrangement can be made if anything be necessary; or I do not object to putting in this bill the provision suggested by the Senator from Vermont, that when the Territory is organized into a State the corporations shall be subject to the State laws. I think it would be so in any event—it has been so held; but if anybody here thinks that the State sovereignty, when organized, might not have full rights over them, let us make it clear by putting in this bill a full reservation on that subject. I think it is not necessary, because without that the same state of law would exist.

Now it has come to this, that there shall be either no railroads in the Territories, or some authority by which railroads can be created. Any authority by which a railroad can be created may find that railroad in two different States when the States are organized, and consequently the question suggested by my friend from Delaware may arise in any event under any machinery that we may devise for the building of roads. Our allowing everybody to build that will comply with this law does not complicate that matter at all. Take the Salt Lake, Portland and Dalles road, from Ogden to Portland, Oregon; what is the difference whether that has been organized under a general law or a special law? That is organized under a law of Congress, and that road will be in different States when you come to organize the Territories into States. So by your special legislation you do not avoid these questions, but they apply to every bill that comes up. The advantage of this bill is that it throws the matter open and we get safeguards. We ought to make this bill a good bill. I admit that. If there is any objection to the bill on account of the want of safeguards, let them be put on it.

Now I propose to look further into the suggestions of the Senator from Delaware. He says there is no provision of citizenship for the directors. I would suggest to him that the difficulty is not as to where the directors reside. It was considered by the committee whether it was necessary to require them to reside in the Territory, and it was suggested and well maintained by several members of the committee that that was not the difficulty; that the real thing was to have a place of business in the Territories. If the directors had to go there to do the business of the company, it matters not where they live. If you provide that the directors shall be citizens of the Territory, they may go off to the city of New York and put up jobs; but we require the office to be along the line of the road, and there the books are to be kept and the company's business transacted. That was considered by the committee as a better safeguard than any residence or citizenship of the directors. We make the corporation itself a citizen of the Territory; that is the citizenship we want. Its books are to be open there; its business is to be done there; the directors come there to do business. That is the only citizenship that is important. It does not make any difference if the directors are all citizens of Boston or New York, or anywhere else, if they come into Montana to build a railroad they must be there to do business. I want the real parties in interest to be directors, I want them on the ground, and they have to be there under this bill, for the corporation itself resides there. That is the great point to secure.

Then it is objected that there is no mode of serving process on them. We do not want to point out in our law the mode of serving process on corporations. The general laws of the States and of the Territories and of the United States, where the matter is within the United States jurisdiction, provide for that. When you point out a particular way you exclude all others. That would be granting a special privilege to a corporation, not to have it sued as individuals are. Corporations are liable to be sued. The principles laid down in every general work are that where there is no specific mode pointed out the general practice applies. It is well understood. It is inconvenient to provide a specific mode of service of process on a corporation. Let it be left to the laws of the Territories and they will provide for it. We do not wish to do that here. They say what is service upon a natural person; and why not upon a corporation?

The limitations in this bill you will find much more for the protection of the stockholders and the people than in the Pennsylvania law. In the first place we deny them the right to increase their capital stock; we require them to pay in 10 per cent. in money on subscribing; we require them with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, which I think adds to the bill, that the books shall be kept open in the locality; and then we require them furthermore (so that the Congress of the United States shall have a view of what is going on) to make an exhibit each year, which we think will tend to honesty in the management of these roads. We provide—

That each and every railroad corporation incorporated under this act shall annually, in the month of January, make a full report, under the oath of the president and treasurer of said corporation, of the condition of its affairs, to the Secretary of the Interior, showing the amount of the capital stock of such company subscribed, and the amount actually paid in; the gross amount of receipts, and the respective sources thereof, during the previous year; the amount of road graded; the amount constructed; the cost of construction per mile and of repairs and incidental expenses; the net amount of profits; the dividends made; and the debts and liabilities, with such other facts as may be necessary to a full statement of the affairs and condition of such road.

We have endeavored to throw as many safeguards around the people as we could, but we do dissent most emphatically from the proposition that there is no way of authorizing these new Territories to be opened by railroads. They are worthless without railroads. They are mostly mineral Territories. Transportation is the question of existence. As you add to transportation you add to their production. The gold and silver mines of the United States are practically inexhaustible; a thousand years will leave them comparatively untouched; but the great mass of ore is of a low grade, and it becomes a question of practical economy as to how to work it where it is of low grade. Railroad transportation is essential. In my State individuals have built some considerable railroads and are building more with their own money to open and develop these mines. There should be nothing thrust in the way of persons who will do this. They will add to your national wealth. I submit that it is unsafe to leave it to the Territories, because their legislation will be incongruous and crude. We tried it, and Congress found it necessary to stop it. I submit it is not a good way to have them come here and ask for special charters, for we have not time to consider them; they go through in a crude manner and individuals get monopolies and sell out at a great advance to those who desire to build, and it is a practical embargo on building railroads at all. I say that the only way in which this object can be reached honestly and fairly is by a general law, which shall be free to all and give all an equal chance; and it seems to me that we are able here with the aid of my friend from Delaware, my friend from Iowa, and others, to give them such a law that those who desire to build may do so under it without injuring anybody. If being all anxious to protect them we have not the capacity to do it by a general law, we have not the capacity to do it in any other way. We will not do it by special laws, or will not do it by special charters; they get through in the morning hour without discussion; and you find your Territories covered with charters and persons having them to sell; and persons desiring to build are unwilling to build on those terms; and you practically exclude railroads from the Territories where they are the most needed. I say it is the duty of the Senate to perfect a general law; and it is the only way in which this question can be met and fairly met.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the bill on page 16——

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to inquire what has become of my amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. I beg pardon.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have one other amendment that I wish to offer to this bill. In section 10, line 4, after the word "same," I move to insert these words, "or over and upon the track of the constructed road;" so as to read:

That any such corporation whose right of way, or whose track upon such right of way, extends through any cañon, pass, or defile, shall not exclude any other such corporation from a passage through the same or over and upon the track of the constructed road upon equitable terms.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I move to amend the bill by adding at the end of section 8, the following:

But no more than that quantity shall be located at any one station—

So that that portion of the section will read:

And ground for station-buildings, work-shops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations is hereby granted to such corporation, not to exceed ten acres for every ten miles of road; but no more than that quantity shall be located at any one station.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I wish to move an amendment to section 1, line 6. The bill applies to all Territories except the Indian Territory. I move to insert after "Indian Territory" the words "and the District of Columbia."

Mr. STEWART. That is right.

Mr. HAGER. I do not know exactly what the status of the District of Columbia is. It is not a State and is not exactly a Territory, perhaps; at all events the exception had better be put in the bill, I think.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask if there is such a Territory as the "Indian Territory?"

Mr. STEWART. It has been named in that way in a good many bills excluding it from their operation. That is the ordinary way of referring to it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it is generally called the "Indian country."

Mr. STEWART. It is called the Indian Territory when it is excluded from the operation of general laws.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think not. I have never seen that designation, and under the provisions of our treaties with those Indians territorial control cannot be extended over them. It seems to me that the Indian country does not come under this bill at all, and that might be stricken out.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator does not think it is a Territory?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think not.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it will do any harm to keep the words in.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think the words will do any harm in the bill. I think it will do some harm to strike them out.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend by saying "Indian country."

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending amendment? Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, in line 6 of section 1, to insert "and the District of Columbia;" so as to read—

That any rnumber of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory and the District of Columbia, with all the rights, privileges, and powers conferred by, and subject to all the restrictions of, this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend, in section 16, line 6, by inserting after the word "circulation" the words "at least sixty days before making such change;" so that it will read—

And may change the same at pleasure to any other point on said road, giving public notice in one or more newspapers in the Territory having the largest circulation at least sixty days before making such change.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. After the word "Territory," in the sixth line of the first section, I move to add the words "and Indian reservations in the Territories."

Mr. STEWART. What sense will that make? Let the section be read as it will stand with that amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The section, if amended as proposed, will read as follows:

That any number of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States except the Indian Territory and Indian reservations in the Territories, and the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Has the Senator from Nevada any objection to the phraseology of the amendment?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I have some objection to the phraseology of it. These Indian reservations are such a moonshine concern that I do not want to block up the Territories by one of them. They are not going to build any railroads in the Territories to hurt the Indians or affect the Indian Territory. Nobody is going to hurt the Indians by putting their own money into these railroads. They will not hurt any Indians or kill any Indians or do any harm.

Let me give you an illustration of this reservation business. In the eastern portion of my State there is a nice little valley, only about sixty or seventy miles in any direction, known as the Muddy Valley. It is the only place from which the people in that region can draw any supplies. The Indians in that country used to live about the springs and herd stock, and were getting along first rate. If they could be let alone, they were becoming civilized. Every Indian agent reported them more advanced than any others. Now, sir, the Indian Department has taken the whole of that valley, settlers and all, and put it into an Indian reservation. They have taken the Indians away from their homes and employment in different parts of the State, and are pauperizing them in that valley. I do not know the extent of that reservation; I have a resolution drawn up in my desk to find out the extent of it. I suppose if this valley had been in a Territory, the making of that reservation would stop the building of a railroad in the eastern part of Nevada.

These reservations are the veriest humbug that ever emanated from the brain of man. I do not know how many there are; I do not know but that the whole of the Territories are covered with these reservations.

Mr. BAYARD. The pleasant little valley of which the Senator speaks is in the State of Nevada, I believe?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it is not affected by this amendment.

Mr. STEWART. No; but probably there are other valleys in the same situation all over the Territories. Do you want to stop the building of railroads there because there may be an Indian reservation in the way? I am willing to make a provision that they shall not cross an Indian reservation without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. I am willing to agree to anything that is reasonable. But suppose an Indian agent goes out there full of high hopes, and then comes here to the Department, as they always do, and gets a big reservation fixed up, which lies between a settlement and a mining camp, cutting off the people from communication with their homes, are they to be told that they cannot build a railroad across there because of this reservation? I am willing that this right shall be guarded. I am willing to say that these roads shall not cross an Indian reservation without the consent of the President or Secretary of the Interior. In that case surely there will be no harm done, no Indians killed by building a railroad through the reservations.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It may be that these Indian reservations are all a humbug.

Mr. STEWART. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It was pretty near it; perhaps "moonshine" was the word.

Mr. STEWART. That is about it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is undoubtedly very true that they have been treated by the Government as of very little importance; and yet it is a fact that many of those reservations have been set apart for different tribes of Indians; and this Government has pledged itself to protect the Indians from the presence of the whites. There are many instances in which there have been treaties entered into in the most solemn manner, by which the Government has agreed to protect the Indians from any who might trespass upon their rights; indeed, to keep them out of their territory. Now here is a bill that proposes to enter their territory in violation of these treaties. I ask you if that is moonshine? I ask you if it is not a measure which the Senate ought to oppose? It appears to me that it is; and I do not see how we can stand here and undertake to defend our own views and our own sense of justice, when we repudiate our treaties or attempt to set them aside by a statute of this kind. I think the Indians have rights, and I think they should be guarded more thoroughly and strongly than they have been by the American people. They are, as my friend from Nevada will admit, the wards of the Government. Are we to treat them as though they were the enemies of the Government? Are we to treat them as though they were to be driven from civilization and exterminated? No, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Your heart is in the right place, but your head is all wrong on this subject.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. My head has been wrong a great many times; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. STEWART. Your heart is all right.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Let us go according to the heart then; I think it is quite as good a guide as a misguided head. I hope we shall act in accordance with the heart.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I undertake to say that there have been more cold-blooded, miserable, disgraceful outrages committed under the name of humanity to the Indians than under any other name or cloak in any age or nation. Nothing can be found so disgraceful as the mode of treating Indians in America. In the first place, we deny to them the common privileges of humanity, to be men. You treat them as paupers. You herd them together like hogs. In the next place, you have no machinery by which you can tell whether your agents steal the money voted for the Indians or not; and humanity is so weak that you do occasionally find men, when there is no possible means of detecting them, who will steal.

Mr. President, my own State affords the best illustration of the fact that if the Indians are let alone they are inclined to become civilized. They will become civilized if you will take some means of extending education to them, if you will aid them in any humanitarian way, the same as you would aid the poor negro or the poor white, instead of getting up a grand reservation for them and putting them together and pretending to feed them and pauperize them and denying them the privilege of becoming civilized, as your system does. You have got no civilized Indians under your system. You have had the system in operation since the foundation of the Government, and it does not civilize the Indians.

Now, we are told that if there happens to be an Indian reservation on the line of a railroad in this enormous region—for the bill applies only to the Territories—the railroad must stop. You do not stop it for a white man's farm; you do not stop it for a miner's cabin; you condemn that and take it. Although a white man may have his house on the line of a road, you will not let him stay in it if it is needed for a railroad; you condemn it, and you provide in this bill for its condemnation. You go through his house and garden; you tear down his house, if necessary, to build a railroad or a canal or any public work that is needed for public use. But you say if an Indian agent comes here with a view of making a good speculation and gets the land between a mining camp and a railroad reserved, you cannot put a railroad through it. Let that fact be known and every Indian agent will want to establish a reservation right on the line of where there is going to be a railroad, and then he will go to the railroad men and say, "You cannot get over this unless you get my reservation out of the way; I will put a reservation here." The reservations are generally established on their recommendations, and there is no machinery by which the thing can be investigated.

I am perfectly willing to say that these railroads shall not be extended through Indian reservations except under the sanction of the Department; but to say that the mere fact of declaring a reservation shall cut off a settlement from communication, and that done in the name of humanity, is too absurd. Humanity is promoted by developing the mountains, by developing that country, by making it the home of white men. The humanity that aids the Indian is that which treats him as a man, gives him work, teaches him to work. If there is such sacredness in an Indian reservation that there is no way to get over it, if a mining settlement is to be cut off from railroad communication because the road would have to run through one of these imaginary reservations, I should like to know it. I am willing to do anything that is reasonable; and I declare again that I am willing to say that the railroad shall not go through an Indian reservation without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Then certainly the thing will be properly guarded. He has charge of the Indians, and will not give his consent without having the proper guards. Besides, they cannot take any land in reservation, because the bill prohibits them from doing that.

Mr. RAMSEY. They might tunnel under the reservation. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Yes; if it was not more than fifty or sixty miles long. They can take no land on the reservation even for right of way or anything of that kind; but I am willing to say that they shall not go through a reservation if one of them happens to skirt along a Territory unless the Secretary of the Interior gives his consent; and I will suggest an amendment to the amendment if it is in order.

Mr. PRATT. I should be glad to ask my friend from Nevada a question that arises in my mind from the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut. It is this: If there be, as the amendment contemplates that there are, reservations in these Territories belonging exclusively to a tribe of Indians, and depending upon treaties executed between the Indians and the United States, I beg to know by what authority Congress can violate any treaty stipulations?

Mr. STEWART. In the first place, the difficulty about the question is that the bill does not contemplate any such thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; it does.

Mr. STEWART. No; it does not. These reservations are not by treaty at all vesting the right in the land. They are set apart by the Secretary of the Interior without treaty. The treaty does not give them the title to the soil any way.

Mr. PRATT. Does it not give them the exclusive right of occupancy of that body of land?

Mr. STEWART. No, sir.

Mr. PRATT. And provides that without a license from the Indian superintendent no white man shall be allowed to enter the reservation?

Mr. STEWART. The Indian superintendent has the exclusive privilege to trade and speculate and do anything he pleases, and he generally does. There is no doubt about his exclusive rights and privileges; but the Indians have no rights that an Indian agent will respect. That has been shown in my own State. We had there Natchez, one of the best Indians in the United States, a man who was worth four times as much as the Indian agent. Natchez commenced telling about the agent's rascality, and the agent got General Schofield to arrest him and take him down to San Francisco the other day; but General Schofield found out from the citizens there who Natchez was and discharged him, and he is now back again. An Indian agent would not respect the rights of Natchez or anybody else. But, sir, the Indians have no title in the land. It is merely set apart for their temporary occupancy, except in the Indian Territory, where you have those treaties.

Mr. PRATT. One further question. Are their rights in those reservations of such a loose character that Congress may at any time take their rights away?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I was not aware of that.

Mr. STEWART. Congress may take them away, and Indian agents, Indian speculators and traders around the reservation take all their pretended rights away. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut read, so that I may suggest an amendment to it, which perhaps my friend will accept.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think it is right as it is.

Mr. STEWART. Well, I should like to suggest an amendment to it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert after the words "Indian Territory" in line 6 of section 1, the words, "and Indian reservations in the Territories."

Mr. STEWART. I would amend by adding a proviso something like this:

Provided, That no Indian reservation in the Territories shall be crossed without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can offer that as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. STEWART. Then I offer this as a substitute:

Provided, That no Indian reservation shall be crossed by a railroad without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior previously had.

Mr. SARGENT. Let me suggest to my friend from Nevada this form, which I had drawn up:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize any railroad company to enter any Indian reservation or have the right of way over the same without the written permission of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEWART. I will accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that that is offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SARGENT. But it ought to come in at the end of section 8, which deals with the question of right of way. I offer it as a substitute to come in at the end of section 8.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not see how Congress can allow the Secretary of the Interior to set aside a treaty made by the Government of the United States. We certainly have treaties now in force with different Indian tribes by which we have set apart reservations for them, and although the Senator from Nevada may claim, as he does that they have no right to the soil, yet if they have only the right of occupancy, they are to be protected in that right according to the treaty, and the treaty does provide that this Government will protect them against the intrusion of white men and that white men shall not enter into or occupy places within those reservations, except certain persons defined by law.

But the argument which the Senator from Nevada makes is substantially that there are agents who will steal, and therefore it is right for the Government of the United States to violate its treaties. I do not see precisely the relation which the one bears to the other. I do not understand the strength of the argument. When one party does wrong that does not justify another in doing wrong, to my mind. I cannot see anything that would be reasonable or right in this Government forcing a railroad through reservations which are set apart and pledged with all the power of the Government to protect the Indians upon.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this Government organized Territories and invited its white settlers to settle them, and they have gone out into the wilderness and developed the mines and lands and endured all the hardships that pioneers necessarily endure. They are the same class of men that have made America all that it is to-day, not the Indians. Those men, upon the invitation of the Government, have gone into these far-off regions. Can my friend see any right or propriety in allowing a mere Indian reservation to lie between them and the settlements, and prevent the right of way? Can he see any propriety in allowing these Indian reservations, gotten up falsely or fairly, as you please, to lie in the path of progress, so that the pioneer settlers shall be deprived of communication with the rest of the world? He would allow a line of railroad to pass through a church or a city, or anywhere if the higher conveniences of the public required it; he would condemn the miner's property and the settler's property for the purpose of a railroad; but he would not allow any one to cross the imaginary line of a sage-brush reservation, where nobody lives, which is only occupied by lizards and rabbits and a few prairie-hens, with no Indians within a thousand miles of it. That imaginary line is to be allowed to stand between the settler and his home! That is the effect of the amendment. Nobody has the right to remove that barrier because, forsooth, at some time there has been an Indian reservation there, in pursuance of a treaty made. Why, sir, the Supreme Court have held that Congress may abolish treaties, may modify treaties. They decided it in the Cherokee case. Congress can abolish a treaty with England, if they choose to do so. There is no doubt about the power of Congress over the subject.

Then comes the question of right. Now, I do think there must be very sacred property attached to those alkali, sage-brush regions of Nevada, Montana, Idaho, and Arizona, when a mere imaginary line, never surveyed, drawn by some Indian agent, pointing out the extent of country he wants upon which to speculate if it happens to run between the settler and the miner and his home or his base of supplies, cannot be crossed by a railroad. Why? Not because it will injure the Indian, not because it will injure any human being; but because it is an Indian reservation—and there is something sacred about an Indian reservation. Nothing else is allowed to stand in the way of progress. The home of a man in civilized life is not allowed to stand in the way; nothing can stand in the way but an Indian reservation; a reservation made without the expenditure of a dollar; a reservation made without you knowing what you were doing; a reservation made and removed constantly by the Secretary of the Interior, set apart for the Indians temporarily. That is to prevent the construction of a railroad; and even if the Secretary gives his consent it is not to be done. Let that be known, let it be understood that if these agents can get these projected lines of road surrounded by Indian reservations, they can cut them off, and you will find plenty of them. In that way you will isolate the settlements as effectually as if there were an army surrounding them.

My friend from Connecticut may take his compass and his eyeglasses, and every other machinery that he can find to assist him, and he may go into that country where there are these Indian reservations, and if he finds one in ten years he will be smart. They are only on paper. If he finds an Indian who lives on a reservation in traveling for months he will be smart. I have lived in that country for twenty-five years, and I have seen magnificent reports of vast amounts of Indians, but I have seldom seen the Indians. I know some of them in my State. I have cultivated the acquaintance of some of them, and have talked with them, and they say it is all humbug, there are no such numbers. That is the way Natchez and this agent Bateman got into a dispute. Bateman returned too many. Natchez could read a little, and his friends read along with him, and he could not stand it. Said he: "This is not so; he has not fed that number; there are only four hundred of us, and he has got four thousand," I believe it was, and he commenced exposing the agent, and consequently was arrested. Natchez came out best, however, because the white people there knew him very well, and the matter has been discussed in the papers all winter.

The only question here is whether there shall be an imaginary line put into this bill, whereby you shall not be allowed to go through an Indian reservation to a mining claim with a railroad.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I cannot answer the argument of the Senator from Nevada; it is too much for me; and I shall not attempt it; but I will say this: I have sometimes seen ahead an object which was very desirable and which I should like to obtain, but between me and that object lay the rights of some other party or parties, and whether I should secure that object or not would depend upon one of two things: whether I should trample upon the rights of those who had rights between me and the object I should like to secure, or whether I should go around them. Here the claim is that there are certain objects to be obtained, desirable on the part of the Senator from Nevada, but between him and those objects is an Indian reservation, the rights of the Indians, the rights which are guaranteed to the Indians by this Government. Now the Senator proposes by this bill to ride roughshod over those rights instead of going around them or doing without them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to say in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut that I hope it will be adopted, and I think my friend from Nevada himself ought to agree to it. The bill as it stands, without that, certainly authorizes any association of gentlemen, without any further consent of Congress or anybody else, to build a railroad into any of the Territories, as distinguished from the Indian Territory, in the United States, to pass over the reservations which we expressly made by treaty with the Sioux under the General Sherman treaty of a few years ago, where within a few months you know it has been touch and go whether we could keep the peace with those warlike tribes and preserve the settlers on the borders from the havoc of war and preserve the Indians in peace.

The people who are going to build these railroads are not the settlers who take their lives and their pickaxes in their hands and build a railroad for themselves. They are people who build them specially for money—a perfectly proper thing to do. I am not quarreling with those who build railroads; but they build from self-interest, as entering into business. It is not enterprise that builds a railroad; it is the desire for private gain.

Now the question is whether, without reserving to Congress the right to determine in a special case whether there is a paramount public necessity which should lead us to treat with the Indians to pass a reservation to which we have already pledged our faith, we are to say in advance to everybody who chooses to organize a railroad corporation to go to a mine that he has, or whatever may be the motive, that he may violate every treaty we have with the Indians; he may disturb every hunting-ground to which we have sent those Indians, and where they are to subsist, and by which alone as it stands they can be expected to preserve the peace and to keep within the reservations where we have agreed with them they shall stay, and where they have agreed to stay, and open up the country to the vast number of people who are necessary in railway building, the operatives, the laborers, and the disturbance which drives away the game and fills up the country with sutlers and speculators and grocers and rum-sellers and everything else; because we all know what attends the building of a railroad through a country.

We are now in advance, without saying there is a paramount public necessity in this particular case which shall lead us to ask the Indians to modify or to assent, to say that in every case any association of citizens of the United States may go where they will with a railroad over these reservations, when, as I say, in the case of 1866 with all those warlike tribes we have made the most solemn stipulations that the country reserved to them shall be held immaculate from the tread of the white man's foot, and that they shall stay inside of it on their own part. The result is, of course and necessarily, a war, and who is to blame the Indian? Where is he to get his buffalo if ten thousand men are to drive them away? Where is he to hunt the deer and the antelope or whatever else he feeds upon in the pursuit of his methods of getting his living, if these operations of civilization that are spoken of are carried into his midst? It is not a good place to hunt where men are blasting rocks, at least in my country. Of course it is unnecessary to dwell upon this, because everybody can see how it would be. All I wish to call the attention of the Senate to is that we regard our faith and our honor pledged to white men and to white governments and to white societies who are able to maintain their own rights, as sacred; but I think if there is any higher duty in a civilized and honorable government than any other, it is to preserve its faith toward the weak, the ignorant, and the defenseless. That is the condition of the Indian; and if we are to break our faith, let the last occasion be that where we break it with those who are too weak, too poor, or too ignorant to defend their own rights.

The Senator from Nevada says that there are no reservations by treaty, that they are all humbugs. Does the Senator mean to say that the statute-books are not full of treaties with various Indian tribes, dozens, twenties, thirties of them, where specific reservations are set apart and into which it is declared that the faith of the United States is pledged that the white citizen shall not go? He certainly does not mean to say that, because my honorable friend is intelligent.

Mr. STEWART. I thought I was until I heard this speech of yours.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; if my friend was intelligent before and is not now, let us see. Here I open the statutes at random and I find the treaty of 1865 with the Comanche and the Kiowa tribe of Indians.

Mr. STEWART. That is in the Indian Territory, is it not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see where it is.

Mr. INGALLS. It is in the Indian Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The whole of it?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; then these railroads are not to be allowed to go there.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will turn to another. We have got one reservation where they are not allowed to go now. If the railroad is such a necessity for civilization, if you are to say that the railroad must go through a reservation, why should it not go through this one?

Mr. STEWART. It ought to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator has not proposed that. He is perfectly willing to leave this out, but the moment you get out of the Kiowa and Comanche reservation, the moment you find a Sioux or a Crow or whatever he may be in Montana, he has rights which every white man is bound to disrespect, as the old-fashioned phrase used to be. Sir, that will not do; it is felo de se. If this particular treaty which I happened to come upon at random is one where by statute as he leaves it the railroad has no right to go, then I say it furnishes a conclusive argument why every other reservation ought to stand upon the same ground. But I need not turn to another, because my friend knows full well in relation to the great bands of tribes of Sioux in the Northwest, which cover the whole territory from the Missouri to the Rocky Mountains and beyond almost, there are treaties after treaties, especially those of General Sherman and his party in 1867, and another one still later, or before, I have forgotten which, which goes along into the borders of the North Pacific Railroad, into which I had occasion to look a few years ago where these reservations exist and in express terms—it is not by implication but in express terms—it is declared that nobody shall be admitted for any purpose, except that in some of them it is provided, as in this Kiowa treaty which I was going to read, that the United States itself may build a road through the Indian reservation if the public necessity shall require it, in its judgment, and in that case shall pay the Indian the amount of damage and discomfort that is made to him. No right even in that case is reserved to the United States to delegate in general to any corporation that may spring into existence any such right, but it is the right of the Government acting for itself to build a public highway for itself, for which it shall pay the Indian in that reservation.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator deny the power to pass this act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do. I deny the power of this body to do an act of dishonor to itself under any circumstances.

Mr. STEWART. That is begging the question. Does the Senator deny the legal power, the constitutional power?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President; I deny the constitutional power of the Senate of the United States and of the House of Representatives to declare that a treaty with Indians, any more than a treaty with a foreign power which reads one way shall be made to read another. I do not deny the power of the Congress of the United States to violate a treaty in the legal sense. If we make a treaty with Her Majesty's government of Great Britain, providing for the submission of claims to arbitration or for paying certain prices for rights of fisheries, I do not deny the power of Congress to violate that treaty by refusing to carry it into effect. I do not deny the power of Congress, if it makes a treaty of extradition, to refuse to extradite. I do not deny the power of Congress to violate any treaty by an act of war when it is a treaty of peace, and to abolish the treaty. Therefore I admit we have the legal power to make war upon the Indian, to invade the sovereignty that by treaty we have confided to him and have declared shall be sacred, and say we will override it; but I deny the moral power of this body; I deny its power in honor and justice, and of every member of it, if the Senator will pardon me, to do any such thing. My friend loves honor as well as I do; he loves to keep faith as well as I do; and if he individually had made one of these treaties with these Indians, he being the sovereign, as the United States is, upon one side, and the Indian upon the other, his right hand would fall from his arm, his eye would burn in its socket, and his tongue would freeze to the roof of his mouth before he would allow such a thing as this to be done. I know him too well not to know that.

But because it is a great nation that has pledged its faith in this way it is very easy to override it. No, Mr. President, it will not do. It will not do ethically; it will not do morally; it will not do in that political sense of the propriety of things as a practical question, because it will give you a dozen Indian wars the moment any of these territories that are preserved as reservations are invaded under the bill.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I did not suppose that such a speech as we have just heard could be made in this body. I am astonished at my friend from Vermont and his plea in favor of the Indian, as he supposes it to be, extending to the exclusion of the white man from the ordinary right of way in a Territory. The right of way to his home is to be cut off by an Indian reservation, whether there is an Indian upon it or not.

The Senator says in a legal sense we have the constitutional power to do this, but morally we have not; morally we are going to commit an outrage that is bringing tears to his eyes; an outrage which we ought not to commit. How is that outrage to be committed? By men building a railroad across an Indian reservation, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. That is to rob the Indian of his sacred rights and violate solemn treaty stipulations! Outside of the Indian Territory which you have dedicated to barbarism, the people in Montana and Idaho will be a little astonished at any such idea as a violation of human rights being connected with this bill.

The Senator talks about the rights of the Sioux on the plains. Why, sir, nobody is going to organize to build railroads there for the present. Besides, whenever they have found it necessary to build a road in such a region, Congress has always passed a law to build the railroad.

He says all this country is bound up by treaty stipulation——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, he says that Congress has passed laws, notwithstanding these treaties, to build railroads through an Indian reservation. If the Senator will be kind enough to point out such a statute I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. STEWART. If your Indian reservations extend across those plains the Northern Pacific Railroad would cut into them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Northern Pacific Railroad, the Senator will find, is specially excluded as it now lies.

Mr. STEWART. They have fixed it now so that they have got it out of the way. But it does not make any difference. The Senator says some great harm is going to be done, some sacred right is going to be violated; and although we have the legal power we should not do it. He tells us we are going to commit a great outrage by building railroads and disturbing Indian barbarities; that we are going to establish railroads in the Sioux country so as to disturb the Sioux. Why, sir, there is nobody living there, and there would be no object in making railroads there. The only place where this exception could be made available would be in the mining country, where they would want to build to the mines, and where the Indian agent would lay out a reservation across the road to levy blackmail. That is all there is of it. It would never be used to protect the Indians, but to levy blackmail in order to get it out of the way. That is all there is of this thing. If you cannot trust the Secretary of the Interior to say when this shall be done, whom can you trust? The Secretary of the Interior will regulate this whole matter.

You talk about keeping faith with the Indians. You do not keep any faith with Indians; you let your agents make bargains with them that you cannot fulfill. If you would treat the Indians as you treat other men, subject them to your laws, let them become civilized, you would get along a great deal better with them. But here there is no conceivable chance for anybody to injure them.

You talk about these reservations of Indians outside of the Indian Territory. They never have observed the reservations. They stay as long as they choose, and no longer than you keep them there by your military power or by feeding them. They do not know where the bounds of the reservation are, and care less. Why should that reservation stand in the way of building a railroad or any other kind of road, or tramping across it? You have dedicated the Indian Territory, and we except that.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. I understand the amendment now to be that the railroads shall not cross an Indian reservation without the consent of the President, or, as amended, without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEWART. I agree to that.

Mr. STOCKTON. I listened with great pleasure to the Senator's discourse, in which he objected to special charters. He was in favor of general laws for all the people of this land. Now, I desire to ask him——

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask one question myself. In the name of all that is good and great, how can you have any general legislation for the Indians when you have got a thousand special speculators to get up tricks that rob the Treasury all the while, and where you have Indians returned that do not exist, and where you have a system that you have no responsibility in, and where you have a system that every intelligent man in that region knows is a farce? But the testimony of all the people in that country weighs for nothing as weighed against an Indian agent who has a little speculating scheme. What general rules can you apply to that?

In my own State I have fought appropriations to build up monopolies and to have a large surplus to buy up newspapers and keep politics running. I have fought the reservations. I have fought taking these people from their homes and pauperizing them in herds; and to-day every report from that country says the Indians are in a better condition in Nevada than any other Indians in the United States; and they undertake to say that they are a different breed of men. They have been treated a little differently; but if I could have had my way and given them such aid as to enable them to be educated, and given money to the Indians for proper purposes without helping to pauperize them, and let the people there deal with them, give them work if they are inclined to work, it would have been a great deal better than it now is. But the idea of talking about a general rule that shall apply to a system that no man can comprehend, a system that induces larceny, is absurd.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to have a chance to put my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SARGENT. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. STOCKTON. I am certainly amused at the Senator from Nevada continuing to answer a question which he would not listen to hear. He was talking so much all the afternoon about the Indians that it occurred to me two or three times to suggest to him and to the Senator from California to discuss also the Chinese question on this bill. [Laughter.] I think the Senator from Nevada has managed his bill admirably to-day. I thought of saying something about it two or three times when the bill was really before the Senate, and when he got to the Indian question I thought of discussing the Indian question, and then I had a notion toward the end of discussing the Chinese question or of suggesting to him to do so. What I rose for a few moments since was in the hope of bringing him back to the object he had in view; that was, to pass his bill. I wished to ask him whether it was not special legislation whereby the whole power of five natural persons, as they are called in the bill, to make a railroad or not, is to depend upon the Secretary of the Interior or the President?

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to answer that now.

Mr. STOCKTON. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. It is special to a certain extent. The only question is whether we shall decide that a railroad shall be stopped because there is a little sage-brush within the limits of an Indian reservation over which it must pass, whether the particular alkali where the Indian has a reservation that the Government knows nothing of shall prevent the road going through. I believe I could trust that to the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else; I would even trust it to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. STOCKTON. I understand the gentleman. This bill provides for a company being formed by five "natural persons." What "natural persons" means I do not know exactly. I suppose it means the aborgines of the country. It certainly may mean the Modoc Indians. It possibly also means the Digger Indians, and they will not be deprived of their food, as was suggested by the Senator from Vermont, because they live, I think, upon dirt. It probably embraces the Chinese. These five natural persons, certainly not necessarily citizens of America, not described, as in the Pennsylvania law, as citizens of the State, are to form a corporation. This bill is much wider; it is not contracted as these miserable State bills are. It permits the Digger Indians, the Chinese, and the whole world to come in, provided they come up to the standard of "natural persons." The courts will have to decide what are "natural persons."

The Senator from California reminds me that I am speaking by his courtesy, that he waived his motion for an executive session; which I had really forgotten for the moment. The Senator from Nevada having interrupted me in the remarks I was about to make, I forgot that I was speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from California. I rose simply to put this question seriously to the Senator from Nevada, whether this is not the worst special legislation in the world? Here, when there is a doubt as to whether the Territories themselves should, as the States do, charter companies to do the work that is necessary in making common highways, the Congress of the United States by a bill, however carefully perfected, undertakes to do that thing for the Territories. In despite of his argument against special legislation, the Senator from Nevada proposes that the Secretary of the Interior or the President of the United States may decide whether these five natural persons when they make their application shall be allowed to construct a railroad or not. That amendment is nothing but a proposition to take the power from the territorial governments, to take it from the Congress of the United States, and give the absolute power to the executive authority of this country. The absolute power of what? The absolute power, as the bill says in one of its sections, to run through all the public domain of this country and to take private property not for public purposes under the act but for private purposes, a proposition that violates not only the Constitution of the United States, which forbids that thing to be done, but is so loosely guarded that the citizen who is deprived under the bill of his property has no remedy or place to seek redress; and that power under that bill, not sufficient yet it seems, is to have added to it an amendment which gives the permission for these five natural persons to do it or not to do it to the executive power.

Mr. President, I did intend during the day and have two or three times attempted to get the floor to speak against this bill, the whole bill, the principle of the bill, as violative of every system of general railroad laws as well as special railroad laws ever adopted in this country, and one which will be regretted more than any bill that has passed Congress this session, if it shall be passed; but remembering that I am speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from California I will reserve my remarks to some other occasion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MOIETIES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The Committee on Ways and Means have had the subject of moieties, fines, penalties, and forfeitures before them; and I am directed to report a bill bearing upon one portion of the subject, and to ask that it may be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to say, as one member of the committee, that this bill has not received any vote of the committee. It is merely reported for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted. In my judgment it is entirely insufficient to meet the requirements of the case.

The bill (H. R. No. 2881) to repeal all moieties, and for other purposes, was received and read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask that the bill be read at length.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps the gentleman's purpose will be served if the bill be printed in the RECORD. I ask that that order be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

It is as follows:

A bill to repeal all moieties, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all provisions of law under which moieties of any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, or any share therein, are paid to informers, or officers of customs, or other officers of the United States, are hereby repealed; and from and after the date of the passage of this act the proceeds of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. That it shall hereafter be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys specifically appropriated by Congress, to make suitable compensation to informers and other persons aiding in the detection of smuggling and other offenses against the custom-revenue laws, or aiding in convictions for the same; and he shall annually report to Congress, in detail, all payments by him for such purpose. Whenever any officer of the customs, or other person, shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise in the act of being smuggled, or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure, after deducting all costs and charges connected therewith. And whenever any person, not an officer of the United States, shall furnish to a district attorney, or to any chief officer of the customs, original information concerning any fraud upon the customs revenue, perpetrated or contemplated, which shall lead to the recovery of any duties withheld, or of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred, such compensation may, on such recovery, be paid to the informer as shall be just and reasonable, not exceeding in any case the sum of $10,000, which compensation shall be paid, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys appropriated for that purpose.

SEC. 3. That no payment shall be made to any person claiming as informer in any case wherein judicial proceedings shall have been instituted, unless his rights as such informer shall have been established to the satisfaction of the court or judge having cognizance of such proceedings and the value of his services duly certified by said court or judge for the information of the Secretary of the Treasury. And when any fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be collected without judicial proceedings, the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, before directing payment to any person claiming as informer, require satisfactory proof that such person is justly entitled thereto.

SEC. 4. That whenever any district attorney shall receive notice of any application before the judge of the district court for the mitigation or remission of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, he shall immediately notify the collector of customs for the district in which such fines, penalty, or forfeiture was incurred, who shall thereupon notify the person or persons who may be interested in the prosecution of the case, in order that he or they may attend and show cause why the prayer of the petitioner should be refused; and such collector shall also furnish to the district attorney all practicable information necessary to enable him to protect the interests of the United States.

SEC. 5. That no officer, informer, or other person entitled to or interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under the customs-revenue laws of the United States shall be thereby disqualified from becoming a witness in any action, suit, or proceeding for the recovery, mitigation, or remission thereof, but shall be subject to examination and cross-examination in like manner with other witnesses, without being thereby deprived of any right, title, shares, or interest in any fine, penalty, or forfeiture to which such examination may relate: Provided, That in every such case whenever the officer, informer, or person entitled to any share in the fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall appear as a witness, the defendant or defendants shall also be entitled to testify and to be examined and cross-examined in like manner.

CLAIMS OF UNITED STATES TO LANDS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. SENER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2882) releasing the claims of the United States to certain lands in the counties of Accomac and Northampton, in the State of Virginia, owned by the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a report to accompany House bill No. 2189; and the same was recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HARRIET W. WILKINSON.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2883) granting a pension to Harriet W. Wilkinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2884) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED CHANGE OF THE PENSION LAWS.

Mr KELLEY. I present for reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions the memorial of 2,432 pensioners of the city of Philadelphia, protesting against the proposed change of the pension laws. I simply desire to invite the attention of the House to the fact that there is such a memorial.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONS ACTING IN THE INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 2443) to protect persons acting in the interest of the United States, with a substitute to be treated as an original bill, for present consideration.

The substitute was read. It provides that when any person has been or may be prosecuted, either at law or in equity, in any court, by any party, for any act done or omitted to be done to any captured or abandoned property, or property claimed to belong to the United States, or because of any act concerning such property, or injury thereto or loss thereof, if it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the acts done or omitted to be done by the person so prosecuted were done or omitted to be done by him in good faith in order to deliver up or preserve the property for the use of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury may direct the district attorney of the proper district to defend such suit in behalf of the United States. And if said suit shall have been brought in any State court, the district attorney shall file a petition in that court to have the same removed to the circuit court for the district in which such suit is pending, setting forth the order or direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the district attorney believes and has reasonable cause to believe that the subject-matter of said suit is for or concerning property hereinbefore described. And thereupon all further proceeding in said State court in said suit shall cease, and the process and all papers in or concerning the same shall be transferred to the circuit court, and the same shall have day and hearing therein the same as if brought within the said circuit court with like effect to the defendant as is provided in case of suits against an officer appointed or acting under or by any revenue law of the United States, or a person acting under authority of such officer.

Mr. BECK. I object to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman will not object if he will hear me explain it for a moment.

Mr. BECK. It is in substance the old habeas corpus law of 1862.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make a statement in explanation.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement, but I object to the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The purpose of the bill is only to allow the United States to transfer suits which they ought to defend. It is made to cover this class of cases. There was certain property undertaken to be dealt with by parties for the United States. The law now allows the officer to have his suits tried in a United States court, but any person acting with him or under his direction may be tried in a State court and may not be defended by the United States. This provision, after full argument before the Committee on the Judiciary, was unanimously agreed to; and I feel certain that if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] had heard the argument he would have agreed to it. Now I only desire that the bill shall be brought up for consideration.

Mr. BECK. I make no captious objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman intends to persist in his objection there is no use in debating the bill.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that I object to the bill because I am opposed to the principles it asserts. There were in my State many who were not officers, but who pretended to be, and they would get out of the State courts; and in my State, where, upon a line of seven hundred miles, there is practically only one United States court, that at Louisville, it was a virtual abandonment of the whole prosecution.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made the bill is not before the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; then I call for the regular order.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for the morning hour begins at twenty-two minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1540) to prevent officers of the United States receiving or being paid any money beyond their fixed salaries, which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to make a suggestion before the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] takes the floor. I understand that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service obtained the floor yesterday only two or three minutes before the expiration of the morning hour, and I desire to know if the committee cannot have one more morning hour besides to-day.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope there will be no objection. Unless that permission be granted the committee will have no opportunity to present their business to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question need not be settled now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think that it would be better that it should be settled now, as its decision would control the order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service may have the morning hour of Tuesday next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We had only three minutes yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The committee had thirteen minutes yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We had only three minutes after the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service will be entitled to the morning hour of Tuesday next.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the original bill, which was pending at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday.

The Clerk read the original bill as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no officer or employé of the United States shall receive or be paid, directly or indirectly, any money or property under the name of contingent expenses, or any other name or form, beyond his legally established salary, except in cases of customs informers; and that no public property shall be used by officials for private purposes.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the payment from the Treasury of all actual and necessary traveling expenses of United States officials when performing the legitimate and necessary duties pertaining to their offices.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the substitute reported by the committee.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

That no officer of the United States shall, directly or indirectly, receive or be paid to or for his own use or benefit any money or property whatever of the United States, except a salary or compensation to be fixed by law; and that no public property shall be used by officials, or by any persons, for private purposes.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the payment from the Treasury of all actual and necessary traveling expenses of United States officials when performing the legitimate and necessary duties pertaining to their offices.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] offers the amendment to the substitute which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the words "fixed by law," in section 1, line 6, the following:
Or make any private profit or use of the labor or services of any person employed by the United States, which labor or service is paid for by the United States.

Mr. WOODFORD. Mr. Speaker, in order to perfect the pending substitute I desire to offer two amendments. I move first to add at the close of the first section the following:

Except that the President of the United States and officers of the Army and Navy may occupy residences provided for them by law.

The SPEAKER. These amendments are admitted by consent.

Mr. WOODFORD. I also offer as a second section what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter no officer or employé of the United States shall, directly or indirectly, as fee, perquisite, or otherwise, receive to his own use and benefit any moiety or share of any fine, forfeiture, or penalty imposed for any violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. SPEER. Was the first of these amendments adopted by consent? I object to it. I mean the amendment providing for the Government furnishing residences for officers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said that the amendments would be admitted by unanimous consent to be pending; not that they were agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEER. O! very well.

The SPEAKER. The condition of the bill is such that no additional amendment could be offered except by consent. The amendments are not assented to by the House; they are merely considered as pending.

Mr. WOODFORD. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill which is reported by direction of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, and as further amended by myself, is very brief. So concise and direct are its provisions that they need but to be read to arrest the attention and I trust to command the support of this House. The first section declares two ideas in regard to official administration and seeks to destroy two evils.

One word as to each.

Public officials should be fairly recompensed, but office-holding should not be made so lucrative as to be sought for the purpose of gain. The honor of public service should be in large degree its own high reward. The official should be so paid as to be able to keep himself and family in moderate, simple, republican manner of living. But whatever may be said as to rate of salary, the compensation should be fixed and certain. If the purpose of extra allowances, shares or moieties in fines and forfeitures, be to keep from the people at large accurate knowledge of the actual emoluments of the office, it can only be to deceive the people. It must be from fear lest if they knew the total profit the pay would be reduced. If this be the object, the method of payment is a practical deceit. The simple statement is surest demonstration of the evil, and should be strongest argument for its abolition.

If the purpose of allowing the official to share in fines and forfeitures be to stimulate him in the detection of fraud, then such a system also and in equal degree stimulates cupidity and avarice. It is fatal to the high-toned, absolute integrity and judicial fairness which should mark the relations between a free government and its officials on the one hand and free citizens upon the other. He who sits in the seat of customs, who collects the revenue, who pleads the civil cause of the Government in our courts of law, who prosecutes the offender against good order and morals in the name of the people, should not be tempted by thought of private gain to that kind of prosecution which becomes practically persecution. He should be fairly paid for fair and equitable service. He should seek to do absolute justice between the Government on the one side and the citizen on the other, without hope of personal gain, without fear, favor, or reward.

Secondly. It has been frequently charged during the debates of this session that officials are in the habit of employing public property for private purposes. It has been openly suggested upon this floor that the enlisted men of our Army are doing duty as ushers, waiters, and servants in private mansions; that the horses and carriages, ostensibly kept for departmental use, are in fact employed for family and social purposes, and generally that the scant salaries of Washington officials are thus eked out by private use of public property. I know not how these things may be. The alleged abuses, if such exist, are doubtless the gradual growth of a long-continued system, and probably had their root in those days which we call the purest as certainly they are the oldest of the Republic. But be these things as they may, we want no little lies, no petty pickings about official administration. This is good time to open the doors and windows, let in the sunlight and air, dust down the ancient cobwebs and garnish anew the chambers of our state. If the alleged evils do not exist, then the second clause of this first section of the bill can do no harm. If they do exist, it is far better to stop them here and now. Practical prevention will do more good than idle criticism. Let us cease scolding and simply but squarely stop the abuse.

The second section of this bill directs that the proposed law shall not be so construed as to prevent the payment from the Treasury of all actual and necessary traveling expenses of United States officials when performing the legitimate and necessary duties pertaining to their offices. This section explains and, I presume, enforces itself. The evils which we seek to cure are wide-reaching. They demoralize the consciences of our officials. They demoralize the public sense and the public virtue. Men are seeking office to get gain, not to serve the State. Let us do what we can to restore the simplicity, the integrity, the high sense of official honor which should illustrate and dignify the administration of this Republic.

The people ask at our hands practical reform. I think that I do not mistake the public temper when I simply say that the people have resolved that they will have practical reform. Let me appeal to my brother republicans to meet the duty of this hour manfully and firmly. Let me appeal to the gentlemen of the opposition for one brief hour to forget party policy and party criticism and unite with us in giving to the people the assurance and substance of practical improvement which this bill embodies. No man can be prouder than myself of the great record which the republican party has made in the past. Let that record be the pledge and the prophecy of what its members and leaders shall do in the present and in the future.

But let us never forget that parties are means and instruments, not ends; that even the great party so long in control, with all its glorious history of partisan and national achievement, with all the popular love and honor which cluster around it, can only endure in strength and power so long as it shall secure to the people good government, wise and honest administration. I believe that it shall thus continue long in power by thus bravely deserving power. But of this let all of us be assured, that if it does not deserve success it ought not and will not long continue to achieve success.

Let us who to-day sit in the places of the fathers, and are charged with the law-making power of the Republic, do all that we justly may to accomplish these desired ends of honesty and efficiency in the public service. If we do not fulfill the duty of the hour, then others shall come with larger faith in the right, with surer knowledge of the right, with braver will to do the right. As the state is higher than party; as principles are more enduring than men, so an intelligent and virtuous people will themselves accomplish practical and needed reforms; if not through us, then against us and over us.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I do not seek the floor to make any opposition to this bill or to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from New York to his own bill. I desire for a moment the attention of the House to the condition of the question before the House. The bill proposes to cut off all compensation to any officer of the Government which is not derived from a fixed and established law either in the name of salary or compensation. To that, Mr. Speaker, I give my hearty assent. The amendment to the bill offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] proposes to cut off all moieties paid to custom-house officers. To that, at a proper time, I shall also give my hearty support; but I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to this bill. If we pass this bill and stop there, we shall deprive a large portion of the public service of the country of any compensation whatever, and therefore, while the law should be passed as he has it, there should come along with it a provision establishing compensation. If the gentleman will look into the matter as the Committee on Ways and Means, charged by this House with that duty, have been doing for the last six weeks, he will ascertain that a large portion of the official service of the United States depends for its pay upon fees. Take for instance the collectors of the ports of Boston and New York and Philadelphia. It is generally understood that the salary of the collector of the port of New York is $6,000. That is not so. If you look into the law establishing his compensation you will find that he derives his whole compensation from fees arising from the collection of revenue and the amount which he takes out of those fees is limited to $6,000. He keeps an account with the Government of all his customs duties and charges the fees on one side, all of the fees, just precisely as if he were to take them as his compensation. Then he takes out of those fees $6,000 for his salary, and the rest goes into the Treasury. As of him so of them all. Some of them have a fixed salary of two or three hundred dollars, and the rest of their compensation is derived from fees. If the gentleman had gone into an examination of the law with my distinguished friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and my colleague [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who are members of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, he would have found that to a great extent the compensation of the officers to which I have referred depends upon fees.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And so with districts attorneys.

Mr. DAWES. Yes. That should not be so; their salaries should be established by law. Yet the gentleman proposes by this bill to cut off all these fees and provide afterward for their salaries. That will not do.

As to moieties, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the first week of the session the House called for information in reference to moieties, and charged the Committee on Ways and Means to investigate that subject. And we have been meeting at ten o'clock every day during the session and nearly every day during the recess and devoting the most of our time to this investigation. We are now about prepared to report. While I do not wish to antagonize this bill at all, I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] that he himself move to commit this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, and in a few days we will report it back with such provisions as we deem necessary with reference to moieties and salaries, so far as custom-house officers are concerned. We will not attempt to fix salaries for any officers not connected with the revenue.

Mr. WOODFORD. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the House to this bill reported from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and to its various amendments. The object attempted to be reached by the bill will meet the approbation of every one. I think one of the greatest wrongs in our present system of compensation of officers is the inequality growing out of unfixed salaries. But while attempting to reach that wrong, this bill will work a great degree of wrong in another direction. Under the bill as it now stands all officers paid by fees will suddenly find themselves without any salary whatever. While I am in favor of the principle of the bill, I think it is substantially unconsidered.

Now take this provision of the bill, that no public property shall be used by officials for private purposes. That would take away the quarters provided by Government for its soldiers.

Mr. WOODFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts is in error. An amendment was moved to this bill this morning in regard to the President and Army and Navy officers, but not in regard to private soldiers. Their use of tents, quarters, and the like, when in the military service, is in no sense the private use of public property.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not know what amendments you have moved; I am dealing with the bill as reported. Whatever amendments you may have proposed they have not yet been adopted. This bill as reported would cut off every commandant and every officer employed in our navy-yards from using the quarters provided by the Government. It would cut off every professor at West Point and at Annapolis from living in the houses provided by the Government. It would cut off every possible use by an officer of a horse belonging to the Government. I do not see that under this bill the President could continue to occupy the White House, because he must use it for private purposes, unless eating, drinking, and sleeping are public purposes. Therefore, I say that, in my judgment, this subject has not been well considered.

I know what is meant to be reached. I desire to state to the House that when the gentleman says he wants to go back to the purity of our fathers in this regard, he certainly has not well considered the history of the country. Would he offer an amendment preventing any public officer from dressing up his coachman in such a coat as he chooses, and providing that he shall not have such buttons as he may select, that he shall not put on such colors as he pleases, and directing the form and make of the band about his hat? Pardon me; this is a land of liberty I take it. I hope we shall not go into that. If we are to go back to the fathers, I will go back to the Father of his Country. I have heard a great deal said in these latter days about public officials of the republican party riding in public carriages. Sir, George Washington never traveled a rod in the public service without he made a requisition on the Quartermaster-General's Department for a coach and six horses for himself, and a coach and four horses for his secretary. And these requisitions can be found on the records of your War Department. He never came to Congress unless he came in a coach drawn by six white horses, and the servants of the Quartermaster-General black-balled the hoofs of these horses for ornaments.

Mr. WOODFORD. Allow me to make a suggestion. I yielded to the gentleman for five minutes. I have no objection to his occupying what time the House will give him; but I must, as a matter of justice to all, attempt to have the hour fairly divided among those who desire to speak.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will not be half as long as the gentleman was; I will get through in a moment. As with George Washington, so it was from the beginning of the Government. John Adams, a purer man than whom in public office never lived, rode in a public carriage. Thomas Jefferson, not liking the poor old horses that were returned by John Adams's inventory as the property of the public for the use of the President, and being a horse fancier and having good horses of his own, had the public horses sold, and used his own horses and took commutation for the use of them, properly and rightly. That is what the fathers have done. Yet, to-day, if the Attorney-General of the United States happens to buy a carriage which is in good taste, of a style for which newspaper reporters can get a French name, then the whole country is convulsed; while George Washington could ride in a six-horse coach, with Cupids at each corner holding up wreaths of flowers, and painted yellow at that, and his secretary rode in a four-horse coach. And that was the purity of our fathers; and to that gentlemen want to go back. I rather think the President of the United States would like to go back to that kind of purity. Some persons object now to his driving his own horses. I have seen some criticisms in the newspapers against the President driving his own horses.

Now, sir, it seems to me, (I may be wrong, and I speak with great deference to everybody else,) it seems to me that for a great party in the Congress of the United States to be engaged in a matter of this kind is attending to the "tithe of mint and anise and cummin," while neglecting "the weightier matters of the law." I hope therefore that the bill will either be recommitted to the Committee on Civil Service Reform or will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. If the latter committee has this whole matter under consideration, perhaps the bill had better go to that committee.

Mr. WOODFORD. I yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. WOODFORD] has anticipated in his own eloquent way nearly all that I desired to say; hence I will at this moment give only a brief statement of a matter in my personal experience, as showing that the time has come when the republican party must take care not only of the weightier matters but also of the smaller ones. The morning after I introduced into the House the bill for which this is a substitute, a Government official pressed himself on this floor and in an excited manner approached me, saying, "This bill will ruin me; it will take away the Government carriage which I use, and it is impossible for me to get along without it." I investigated the facts, and I have found that this Government official travels no more in any day of the year than every member of this House in going from Department to Department; and we are democratic enough either to go on foot, to ride in the street-cars, or, if we use carriages, to pay for them from our own pockets. He said that the bill would be very hard upon him; that he saw no objection to his wife's riding in the Government carriage when he did not want it! Never before did I feel the importance of one feature of this measure so much as then. I thought it time that Congress should probe these abuses to the bottom and root them out altogether, because the people of this country are not willing to pay the private family expenses of officials of this Government. I said to him, what I say here to-day, that the republican party cannot afford longer to carry the wives of public officials.

Mr. WOODFORD. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to introduce some time ago a proposition, which I had very carefully considered, for the disposition of this subject; and this will be my excuse for mingling in the present debate. I do not agree with anybody who thinks that the question whether a Government official deals with the public property as his own, or with exact integrity gives to the public use what the people provide for that purpose, confining himself rigidly to his own salary for his compensation, is a trifling matter or a matter of "mint and anise and cummin." I think that the confidence which the American people shall entertain in the personal purity of the men whom they elect to serve them, from the President of the United States down to the humblest official, is the very "weightiest matter of the law."

But I think that the bill which has been introduced by the distinguished gentleman from New York is liable to the objection that while it breaks up an abuse it would also destroy what has been the necessary policy of the law from the beginning. For instance, it would be utterly impossible and ridiculous to compensate the deputy United States marshals by fixed salaries. They do certain special duty in the services of writs and processes; and from time immemorial in England and in the United States, under State jurisdiction as well as that of the General Government, officers serving civil and criminal process have been paid by fees, graduated according to the trouble and expense of the service. Now, that policy, which experience in our most economic State administrations shows to be a necessity, this bill would cut up by the roots.

Early in the session it was said in the hearing of this House by a gentleman [Mr. DAWES] who had formerly held the position of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and who knows as much about the expenditures of this Government as anybody in the House, that the President of the United States, in addition to his salary of $50,000, receives what is equivalent to $50,000 more in perquisites and other matters which are not imputed to his salary in the public knowledge or in the public account. Now, in my judgment, instead of reducing the salary of the President of the United States to $25,000, leaving untouched this $50,000 of perquisites, it would be wiser and more satisfactory to the people to fix a generous and liberal salary in terms for the President and let that be his whole compensation. I think such a mode of payment would be much more satisfactory to any gentleman who might hold the great office of President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is also liable to the objection made by my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] who has addressed the House this morning. The gentleman from New York cannot have considered how the measure would affect, for instance, officers of the Army and Navy.

Mr. WOODFORD. The amendment which has been read from the Clerk's desk this morning, but which neither the gentleman nor his colleague can have heard, if I may judge from their remarks, provides that Army and Navy officers shall be allowed the use of the residences now provided by law, and that the bill shall not interfere with the occupancy of the White House by the President of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Alloy me to ask my colleague a single question?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The House will have to extend my time a single minute if I do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly. I have heard it stated once or twice that the President gets $50,000 additional in perquisites. Will the gentleman have the kindness to specifiy how he gets it—wherein?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I did not say so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understood you to say so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Nothing of the kind. I said a gentleman who knew as much about such matters as any one in the House, and who had been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, had stated the fact early in the session. It was a statement I was surprised to hear. I have not investigated it for myself. What I did say was this, that supposing the fact to be so I was sure it would be much better and more agreeable to the President of the United States, and more consonant to sound policy, that he should have a liberal salary—any sum—rather than to have his salary cut down to a low figure, leaving this charge to remain against him of receiving uncounted perquisities in addition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I quite agree with my colleague.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I drew up some weeks ago a proposition on this subject which is very carefully guarded. It leaves the matter of moieties altogether to the committee who has that special subject in charge and can report at any time. The House ordered that proposition should be in order when the appropriation bill was again before the House. So whatever the House chooses to do on that subject can be put into the appropriation bill under this proposition of mine. It cuts out vigorously and thoroughly this abuse, and it seems to me it is carefully guarded, not going further than is intended. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked, and if the House will be good enough to listen carefully to that proposition I will not trouble them with any explanation of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no civil officer of the Government shall hereafter receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States, or shall make any private use of such property, or of the services or labor of any person in the employment or service of the United States, which service or labor is paid for by the United States: Provided, That this shall not be construed to deprive any officer of the United States of such fees as are or may be expressly provided by law in addition to the salary of such officer, or of the use of such property as may be expressly by law appropriated to the use of such officer.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] will allow the sense of the House to be tested on that proposition. It provides that no officer of the Government shall receive any compensation or perquisites or property of the United States, or service or labor of any person paid by the United States, for his own private use, except where it is so expressly provided by law. It excludes West Point and the White House, and other cases where the property of the United States is expressly provided by law for the private use of the official, and there he is at liberty to use it. The amendment is carefully drawn up, and is well guarded.

Mr. WOODFORD. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the gentleman from New York agree to let me offer that amendment?

Mr. WOODFORD. I will answer the gentleman in a few minutes.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is in the right direction, and as such I am glad to see it here, although I agree fully with gentlemen who have made objections to certain details that it should be elaborated and perfected before it is passed.

I think few men here will fail to agree with me that it has come about not this year nor last, not during the administration of the Government by the republican party, but in the course of the history of the Republic, that offices are sought because of advantages outside of the regular and fixed salaries that appear to the people as the compensation attending an office whenever an officer is appointed. That is a thing that ought to be corrected.

Take for instance what this bill aims at in reference to large sums of money received by certain civil officers in the service of the Government under the name of moieties. I do not believe in moieties myself. The policy which permits them is radically wrong, and works evil. Take for illustration the customs service of the Government. Nowhere is it so true as in this service, that if you take care of the minutes, the hours will take care of themselves. But the system of moieties works the reverse of this. The Government will never collect its revenues well unless its regular force, down to the lowest officials, whose duties lie nearest to the point where infractions of our revenue laws occur, are sufficiently paid to do their duty. It is of great importance that the regular inspectors and deputy collectors on our coast and frontier who watch for smugglers shall be amply paid; that the clerk in the appraisers' office, who looks to the invoices, shall be amply paid; that the entry-clerk, who, if underpaid, may be seduced from his duty by a small sum, shall be amply paid—much more important than that an immense compensation shall be rolled up for the collectors and surveyors and naval officers of the great ports of the country through this source of moieties. Such swollen salaries do not tend to the bettering of the collection of the revenues of the Government. And in the direction of limiting this the bill is right. But it does need elaboration. It does need perfecting. And I do not see how we can vote for it as it is now. The objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] on my left, as to deputy marshals, is a pertinent one; not very important in itself, but showing imperfections.

Now, further, in reference to the other feature of the bill, the restriction upon Government officials as to the use of Government property. Sir, I have never believed that the public officers of to-day in this regard have gone beyond what has been done in times past. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has said, this practice has come down to us from the beginning of the Government; and I believe a careful scrutiny would show that to-day the practice is less than it was fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, fifty, or seventy-five years ago. There is no reflection made upon officials of to-day. But granting all this, still public attention has been called to the matter, public discontent has been to some extent raised, and the people are many throughout the land who are exercised and aroused in regard to it, and believe there should be limitations. And to me there is no abatement of dignity in our respecting any honest hearty sentiment when we find it out, and legislating in accordance with it. I would not move in this direction if I thought it would operate as an unfair censure; but no officer can object to proper limitations. And I would say, let it be fixed for the future, by the passage of a law, how much property may be used by a public officer, more or less, or none; so that when each man gets into office he shall know what he may depend upon.

Mr. WOODFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor early in the session of introducing a resolution, which was adopted by the House, instructing the Committee on Civil Service Reform to inquire and report as to the expediency of paying all Government officers salaries to be fixed and determined by law. And I am very glad that the committee, unanimously I believe, have agreed to the principle, although there is some difference as to the extent to which that can be made applicable covering the whole field of Goverument officers.

But every one who has paid any attention to the expenses of the Government of the United States that are paid independent of and outside of salaries, outside of any specific and fixed commissions, outside of any sum or amount determined by law in any sense of the word, sums that are paid wholly and entirely at the discretion of some officer of the Government, must have seen that some legislation, something in addition to existing law, should be adopted, which would fix and establish by law the amount to which any officer of the Government should be entitled as a salary or compensation.

As I have but five minutes, I desire to call attention here to a particular instance—and I would especially ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—a particular instance in which it seems to me that legislation is expressly needed in this direction. I hold in my hand a statement with respect to the expenses of the several internal-revenue collection districts in the United States. It appears from the summary at the conclusion of this statement that in the first, second, eighth, ninth, and thirty-second collection districts of New York, and the first Louisiana district, there are special allowances for salaries and expenses of offices; while in the other districts the expenses of collection are paid by the collectors out of their commission, which is fixed and established by law. Now, in the eight districts, where these expenses are paid by collector's commission fixed and established by law, the expenses have been $27,250.47—the office expenses to collect $12,483,808.47; while in six districts where the office expenses have been paid by special allowances, these office expenses amounted to $40,360.13, to collect $7,812,192.55—nearly twice as large a sum for office expenses to collect only about half as much revenue. These collection districts selected were city districts, where the comparison could be as well instituted as between any other districts.

Now, the provision of law upon which this special allowance which has run up to this large sum was based was this: the internal-revenue officers have a salary of $1,500 per annum, and then certain commissions on their collections fixed by law; but after a variety of such provisions are recited in the statute determining how the salaries of these internal-revenue officers shall be ascertained, there follows this provision:

The Secretary of the Treasury may make such further allowance from time to time as may be reasonable in cases where by reason of the territorial extent of the district, or the amount of internal-revenue taxes collected, or other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowance.

Under that provision there is no limitation whatever except the discretion of the officer in the Treasury Department who makes these allowances. There is no limitation whatever upon the amount which he may pay as special allowance.

Mr. Speaker, an examination of the books of the Treasury Department will show that these special allowances have been made over and over again to the same collector running back and covering twice or three times the same period of service, and will show that this has been done, I venture to say, in many instances, as a matter of favoritism almost wholly on the part of the officer of the Treasury Department who has it in charge. I call the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means to that particular subject.

Mr. WOODFORD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not wish to prolong this debate, and I should have objected to its going on half an hour ago if there was not to be another day allowed for the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to report. Inasmuch as the Committee on Ways and Means have made a thorough investigation of this subject, and as the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service are not willing to conflict with them, I think that in this particular case our committee would be willing that this subject shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means instead of being recommitted. I really think that this session the Committee on Ways and Means intend to accomplish something in this matter.

The reorganization of the custom service has been before Congress through the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury ever since I have been here, and bills have been sent here by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of dispensing with moieties and making a fixed salary for the different officers; but ever since I have known much about Congress every chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as soon as he took charge of the committee, has considered it his duty to spend at least the long session of Congress in revising the tariff and unsettling the business interests of the country generally by a complete revision of it from beginning to end. That has been done every Congress since I have been here; but as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who is at the head of that committee has gone through that work in the Forty-second Congress, I think he will be apt to report a good bill on this subject during the Forty-third Congress. There are objects designed to be accomplished by this bill which I think most of the members of the House will agree to; but the bill is certainly inartistically drawn and does not meet some of the objections which have been raised to it here. For that reason, speaking in behalf of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, I shall, unless the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill objects, consent that it shall go to the Committee on Ways and Means for action. At the same time allow me to say that that committee and the Committee on Appropriations are very much in the habit of taking charge of the work of reform in the civil service and taking it away from our committee. Even the question relating to the celebrated eight-hour law has been undertaken by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but, nevertheless, we are willing that this particular bill shall go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. WOODFORD. Mr. Speaker, not desiring to divide those who are intent upon practical reform; recognizing that some of the suggestions this morning made are practical; believing in the assurance of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that he and his committee will promptly act upon the questions and principles involved in the pending bill and promptly report their action to the House, and respectfully but very earnestly reminding him and his committee that the country will hold them responsible for the early fulfillment of that pledge, I now move that the pending bill, with the amendments, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and printed, and on that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. It is this: whether or not this morning, as I had offered an amendment to this bill which it is true was not in order, but which has been printed, he did not agree to allow me ten minutes in this discussion? And I will ask him the further question, whether he has not purposely and deliberately confined the debate of nearly one hour upon this question entirely to his own side of the House?

Mr. WOODFORD. My friend from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] asks a purely personal question which it will be more courteous and parliamentary for me to answer in private conversation outside this Chamber. With regard to the division in the House, let me simply suggest that I had presumed upon these questions of reform there was no party division. If the gentleman be opposed to it, I am sorry.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The gentleman knows perfectly well——

Mr. WOODFORD. I must with courtesy, I trust, but with firmness, insist on my motion for the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the House will not sustain the motion for the previous question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. A single word in answer to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has a right to test the sense of the House upon his motion.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am sure the gentleman will be willing to have the proposition I had read just now considered as an amendment to go with his bill.

Mr. WOODFORD. My motion is that the bill and all pending amendments and those suggested be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I desire that committee to have the entire subject before them.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an additional section?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask another question.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls the previous question.

Mr. WOODFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] to offer an additional section to be referred with the bill.

Mr. SPEER. I move the following as section 4:

Any person violating the provisions of this act shall on conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding $5,000 and to imprisonment not exceeding five years.

Mr. WOODFORD. It is understood that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] has permission to offer the amendment about which he is so anxious, and that it shall go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The amendment I intended to offer is substantially covered by that just offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

The question was then taken on seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were ayes 105, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was then ordered.

The question was upon the motion to refer the pending bill with all the amendments to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that the same be printed.

Mr. SPEER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. SPEER. I do it because I believe the reference of this bill will be its defeat.

Mr. WOODFORD. If I believed that, I should oppose the reference. But I have entire faith in the good faith and pledges of the Committee on Ways and Means, as so clearly given through their distinguished chairman this morning.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 70, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. Will the committee have leave to report this bill at any time?

The SPEAKER. They would not under the rules.

Mr. SPEER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the committee have leave to report this bill at any time for the consideration of the House.

Mr. WOODFORD. In that request I cordially unite.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object, and call for the regular order.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House now resumes the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. All here admit that resumption is desirable, in fact imperative, within a few years. The time for such resumption is the question now at issue. An irredeemable currency, with constant fluctuations in value, because of the continued fluctuations in the price of gold, is a great injury to the people. This condition of the monetary affairs of the country stimulates speculation, utterly destroys confidence, prevents honest business transactions, and paralyzes every industry.

The evil of an irredeemable currency we all recognize, and we all do or think we insist upon a return to specie payments. So far as I am concerned I would have this done with the least possible injury to the debtor class. I would not hasten to specie payments, and yet I would provide a not too far distant day for resumption. A resumption by the Government necessitates redemption by the banks of their circulation. By fixing a day I believe the people can in all their business relations work up to such time, and so place their credits and so assume liabilities as to be ready at the stated period. The Government can in a like manner by careful, prudent, and sagacious legislation go hand in hand with the people in reaching this auspicious result. The proposed legislation goes in an exactly opposite direction.

An increase of the volume of currency is demanded. This, as every one will admit, is a postponement of a practical return to specie payments for an indefinite time, with sure result and with aggravated and increased injury, to wit, partial, perhaps wide-spread, bankruptcy. To my mind, all classes and pursuits suffer by an increased volume of currency; but those that all experience has shown to have suffered most at such times are the middle and the poorer classes, and the weaker and smaller industries. The cost of maintaining a family with the necessaries of life is in due proportion increased as money is made cheap. An increased volume is nothing but lowering the value and cheapening the currency, thereby reducing its purchasing power.

Believing, as I do, that an increase of currency at present, whether of greenbacks or of the national-bank notes, to be injurious and as straying away from the defined road to specie payments, I shall, in the future as I have in the past, vote against any and every proposition having this purpose in view. I think our western and southern people will be made aware in the early future that all their hopes in the supposed and proposed remedies for their distressed condition by the legislation now under consideration will prove but a dream.

There are indications, both in the South and in the West, that even in these sections there are thinking and business men who look with great apprehension on such make-shifts as those proposed here. Mr. Forsyth, through the columns of the Mobile Register—one of the old and accepted organs of the democracy of the South—speaks in unmistakable language against an increased irredeemable currency, and urges the leaders of his party and his section, that is, the democracy and the South, to maintain its lifelong principles and adhere now, at the moment of their alleged distress, to the only anchor of safety, a hard-money basis; imploring that the democracy of the nation, through its chosen representatives in Congress, shall not desert its time-honored history. So in the West. The Chicago Board of Trade, representing men of all parties and every character of business in that section, has spoken within a day or two against every resort to an inflated currency.

Before entirely leaving the question of increasing the currency, I want to read short extracts from two letters from well-informed gentlemen of Philadelphia, addressed to me a short time ago:

The country does require more money in the fall and winter to move the cereal, wool, pork, and cotton crops; but I cannot see how any provision can be made by Congress to meet the question without the Government agrees to move the crops, which of course is impossible. I do not believe in this stuff about an "elastic" currency. Money, in all countries, is more in demand at some seasons of the year than at others, and always will be. It is now beyond doubt that the recent panic was caused by want of confidence and the consequent hoarding of money by the people withdrawing their balances from savings institutions and banks. No remedy can be devised to prevent such occurrences. SHERMAN was exactly right when he said so the other day.

Again:

We want no more currency. Money is getting easier daily, and we only want a restoration of confidence to set things in motion again.

It is worth while to reflect that nobody thought we wanted more currency until the recent panic, which, being caused by the people putting the currency in their pockets, when they take it out again there will be as much and more than is wanted.

If one hundred millions more currency is issued, in three months prices will be inflated two hundred millions, and instead of money being cheaper it will be dearer.

I should think the present easy condition of the money market all over the country, and at a season of the year when money is generally scarce, would be a sufficient argument against any inflation of the currency. The panic is over, and money will sell very easy for some time to come to those who have good credit or good securities. It is those who have neither who are clamorous for more paper. It is worthy of remark that the recent panic did not reach California at all, simply because they were on a gold basis.

I think the ceasing of building new railroads will greatly lessen the demand for money. Heretofore these enterprises absorbed constantly an immense amount of money coming from dividends and accumulated profits or income which sought investment, and, seduced by false and reckless advertising, went into the bonds of these new roads. This element being now out of the way, the money will soon find its way into more legitimate channels, to the benefit of the trade and commerce of the country. The late panic was a railroad panic, and hardly affected or broke any concern except those who were connected in some way with new and ill-projected railways.

I have recommended a return to specie payment at a not too far distant day. The question can naturally be asked of me what relief I would propose and what character of legislation I have to suggest to reach so desirable a result.

1. For immediate relief, I would diminish greatly the amount of legal reserves now required by law both as to circulation and as to deposits.

I will state why I would release the reserves and add them to the circulation in active use. The security for the notes is ample, being fully provided for by bonds of the United States on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States. So far as the reserves have been intended as a protection for the depositors, I do not believe it really the duty of the Government to protect depositors in the national banks any more than depositors in the State banks or savings institutions. Those deposits should depend and rely on the confidence between man and man and between corporation and corporation. Thus I would at a single step, and immediately, give relief by making practically an immense increase in the usefulness of the volume of the circulation without any increase in the aggregate amount of the currency.

2. I would permit the payment of one-half, at least, of the customs dues with legal-tenders. The effect of this would be at once to narrow the margin between the current price of gold and the current price of the legal-tenders. I think they would soon reach par. Just after the recent panic they did approach to a value within 5 per cent. of each other in New York and Philadelphia. Nor would one-half such payment of customs dues in legal-tenders endanger the receipt of sufficient gold by the Government to meet all interest dues payable in coin. The gold interest on our present gold interest bearing debt is about $98,000,000. The amount now in the Treasury is $86,000,000. The estimate by the Secretary of the Treasury of gold receipts during the next fiscal year is $180,000,000. One-half would be $90,000,000; only a deficiency of $8,000,000; with, as I have shown, gold enough in the Treasury to meet a like deficiency for ten years to come. This would be a firm and fixed step to a specie basis.

This plan was originally suggested in this House by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and I have always wondered why he did not press that plan; for others, like myself, have felt a delicacy in forcing this question when we had a right to expect its originator in this House to do it.

It has been suggested by some that we should receive all the customs dues in gold. This would meet with two objections. First, those who consider the pledge alleged to have been made to the bondholders of the gold-bearing interest bonds, that dedicated the gold receipts from customs dues to the payment of the interest on said bonds; second, the objection would be made that this would throw the Government into the market as a purchaser each year of the amount of gold necessary to meet the interest, to wit, $98,000,000.

This to my mind would, however, be preferable to the present condition of our transactions in gold, the Government being a constant seller, and a promoter in fact of the gold speculations of Wall street. One good effect would come from this change of the attitude of the Government from a seller of gold to a purchaser, to wit, a complete breaking up of the common practice in New York of "cornering" gold.

3. There is another remedy which I would suggest, and that is an entire repeal of the warehousing system of the Government. This system was an outcrop of the tariff of 1846, and was urged by Mr. Robert J. Walker, then, I think, the Secretary of the Treasury, who wanted an additional revenue, and to get it he offerred inducements for importations. Our main revenue then came from customs duties. We had at that time no system of internal taxation by Federal authority.

This system is an unnatural inducement to importation; and I believe that if it were abolished the imports which are brought here to interfere directly and at favorable times with the sales of our own products would be about $60,000,000 less. If the warehousing system be abolished, there will be no occasion for the repeal of the enactment recently passed whereby the tariff was reduced 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, even under the system to which I allude, the current of trade between this and foreign nations during the last calendar year has been in favor of this country. If we should repeal the warehousing system, we would certainly do away with one source of immense corruption, as instanced in the management of the custom-house in New York, with its Leets, its Stockings, its Jaynes, and their like. At the same time in the $60,000,000 of gold per annum which would remain in this country instead of going abroad, to pay for unnecessary imports under the inducements of this system, we should have so much more gold each year to go upon toward resumption.

Time prevents but a hasty allusion to the present national banking system of the country. I propose, however, at no distant day, and when an appropriate opportunity occurs, to review in all their bearings the present laws in respect thereto. I must in brief now state, in behalf of the democracy I represent, and which I believe is in full accord with the sentiment of the democrats of all the States and Territories of this Union, that the national banking system, as at present organized, is a monstrous monopoly, from which all other monopolies, corporate and private, draw their sustenance, thus leading to the corruption of all political power, and draining the life-blood from the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the country.

Instead of giving additional power under the sanction of law to the present associations, and instead of creating more of these center monopolies, the people demand at our hands that Congress shall place some limit on the centralizing power and enormous corporate advantages of the beneficiaries of the present system. This, if not the feeling of all the people, surely it is the almost sole opinion of the democracy; and yet I find Representatives here who are ready to vote such increase with spirit and alacrity. I say this with respect, but with no less surprise. Gentlemen on this side of the House, in my judgment, who favor an increase of currency should confine it to the greenback, and not aid directly or indirectly in fostering, promoting, and augmenting the great evils of the present banking system.

For myself, I believe the currency of the country should be of but one character, and that made to inure to the benefit of all by a withdrawal of the notes of the national banking associations and the substitution in equal amounts therefor of Government greenbacks. Whether this should be done prior to a resumption of specie payments by the Government when the greenback will be the representative of gold, may, in the minds of some, be a question in controversy, but that this substitution should be provided for immediately thereafter cannot and should not be in doubt.

"The Government wisely monopolizes the right to create money. No State, corporation, or individual can do so legally. What we want is that the Government should use that monopoly for the benefit of the whole people, and not transfer the exclusive right to a few, as has been done by the national-bank act."

The radical republican party of the nation have been the creators, promoters, and supporters of every species of corporate monopoly of which the country complains, and their leaders and representative men, notwithstanding their loud professions to the contrary, are to-day the opponents of any abridgment or repeal of this injurious legislation, destructive alike of private enterprise and individual exertion.

This fact is beyond controversy, and I say to the people their only relief, in my judgment, is in a complete change of administration. The greatest of all of these monopolies is our national-bank system. Let us as a party have no lot or parcel with men of such views and actions. Rather let us go to the front of our future battles with this inscription on our banners: "A resumption of specie payments, hard money, and a repeal of every species of monopoly," and proclaim this as our purpose in our effort to secure the administration of the Government. If we, as Representatives, localize ourselves, and separate from the well-settled principles of the party, we must measurably denationalize the party we represent.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire in the very brief time allowed at this stage of the debate to address a few words to the judgment especially of my associates on this floor from the West and from the South. To gentlemen from the East also, who regard the entire western country as given up to the idea of inflation, unconditional inflation, I desire to show that there are some reasons of good sense to be attributed to the West which those gentlemen have totally failed to recognize in their discussion of this bill.

First, upon the question why the people of the West wish to establish banks when it costs them one hundred and ten or one hundred and fifteen dollars of good money already belonging to them to gain ninety dollars of circulation through the banks. We have been met continually with that allegation, as showing a want of sense in the demand of the West. Sir, we do not demand banks for the sake of the few bank-notes they issue to us. We want banks to establish local money centers which shall gather up and utilize and make movable every dollar that is owned in the tributary district of which the bank is the center. If there were time, I would read from books and authorities showing that it was this very establishment of money centers in the form of banks which created commerce, as it is known to modern times, and gave rise to great industrial enterprises. There is no time to read authorities; but you cannot fail to perceive that the moment you establish a bank of $50,000 capital in the center of a district in Iowa, you have, with the sanction of Federal law, established an institution which has the confidence of that community; and from all the private hoards of that district the money is poured into the vaults of the bank. What becomes of it then? The bank commences loaning it to men of enterprise in sums adapted to the magnitude of their enterprises. Thus capital is mobilized, and the movements of commerce and active industry go on in that country as they would never go on if each man held his own little purse in his pocket, where the men of industry and commerce could not reach it.

Our banks in the West uniformly, if they succeed, have more deposits than they have circulation. They could not sustain themselves without the deposits; and I state frankly that we should not want banks if it were not for the deposits which they gather together and utilize. So much for the argument that we propose to exchange more dollars for the circulation than we get dollars of circulation in return.

Secondly, upon the question of free banking, I tell our friends from the East we do not want free banking for you if you do not want it. We want to establish what banks we can utilize. You do not want any increase of the currency. Give us the increase we want. If you had given this to us by subtracting it from the hoards you have accumulated, and which remain with you because the last law of distribution is not executed, you would not have heard our demand on this floor for free banking enforced as it has been at this session

You say you do not want to inflate. Then I say to gentlemen, if they will give us simply what we in the West and South can use, that will content us. In the moment which I have to speak on this point, let me say that for myself, representing as well as I know how the interests of the West, I believe that the Senate bill in this respect will be more beneficial to the people of the West than the House bill. I believe it for this reason: that if you have an excess of capital in the Eastern and Middle States, that capital will overflow. If you cannot use it in banking facilities in the East, it will come from the East to the West and the South, where it is needed and where the securities are equally good; and thus it will tend to promote the advancement and development of that portion of the country.

I call the attention of my western colleagues, therefore, to this question, whether it is not best for us to take, exclusively for the States that have a deficiency, the $46,000,000, which is all we can use for a few years to come, instead of adopting the free-banking system generally. This is free banking for the West and the South until this circulation is taken up; and if it inures to our benefit in tempting eastern and northern capital to the West and South in the form of banks, so much the better for the West and the South.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the House bill provides that there shall be an emission of the reserves in all the banks of the country; it takes off the restrictions in this respect in existing laws. In the East and the North there is no necessity for taking off those restrictions. You have enormous deposits; they come from all parts of the United States to those institutions; and you need more reserves there than we need in the smaller banks of the West and South. I do not want the restrictions taken off from these wealthy banks with enormous lines of deposits and enormous calls upon those deposits. Let them be taken off from our country banks, with their limited deposits, but leave them, as now, upon your great central banks in the redemption cities, which must be kept strong for the safety of the whole country. I do not, therefore, like that feature of the House bill as connected with western interests.

Then they also provide in the House bill that the 5 per cent. reserves you do keep are to be taken away from the home banks, and are to be deposited in the sub-treasuries of the United States, and not left in the regions of country where the demand is made. I cannot see to my satisfaction the beneficial effect of this change in the system of the reserves. That feature which prohibits them from keeping any large amount of their reserves in the redemption cities I like. That feature is in the Senate bill also, which reduces to one-fourth the reserves they may keep in the redemption cities. I do not, therefore, think in that the House bill presents an advantage over the Senate bill.

The only remaining point in the bill to which I have time to call the attention of the House is the last section, which has commended itself to the judgment of the financially conservative members of the House as a leaning toward specie payments. I ask the attention of the gentleman who particularly advocates that feature. I do not see him in his place, but I ask, if within hearing, his attention to it. It is that clause which proposes to create a new kind of greenbacks, a greenback which shall be worth gold two years from the time of its issue. It does not provide (and I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to it) the manner in which the new semi-gold greenbacks can be got into circulation. It does not say to whom or how they shall be issued. We do not know how they can be got out of the Treasury. They are not gold, they are not currency, and they will have a value between gold and currency. But this eighth section does not tell you how they are to get into the circulation of the country. I cannot find out from the bill either how they are to be issued, or in what way their market value will be ascertained.

Now, sir, on the question of going back to specie payments, I say, as a western man, we do want to go back to specie payments, but not with a rapidity oppressive to the debtor class. We have no confidence in irredeemable paper money except the confidence that is based on the public pledges to redeem it in gold at some time, a pledge that you have repeated over and over again. I have no confidence in the argument occasionally used on this floor which attempts to convince me or the people whom I represent that an irredeemable paper dollar is just as good as a gold dollar, and that all you have to do is to declare by United States law that the paper dollar is as good as the gold dollar. There is a short argument on this question. Suppose I owe to the most prominent unredeemable inflationist on this floor ten dollars. I go to him with this ten-dollar "greenback" in one hand, with all the property of the United States behind it, with all the laws of the United States guarding it, with all the unexecuted pledges of the United States to make it as good as gold; and in the other hand I take this golden "eagle," which has got merely the mint stamp of the United States on it, no mortgage or land or public pledges or financial theories behind it, which is yellow, not green in color, and which contains for every dollar named on it twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of gold; and I ask him to take his choice in payment of the debt I owe him. Will he take the paper that has all the laws of the United States behind it, all the billions of the Federal census to support its value, and all the pledges of the Government faith for its redemption? or will he take this metal which has no security or pledge behind it, but which contains simply a certain number of grains of gold? My friend in front of me, which will he take if he has his choice?

A MEMBER. Both.

Mr. KASSON. Let him have his choice, and which will he take? He will take the gold every time.

Now, sir, that argument you may take into every district in these United States, and put it against all your fine-spun theories of the inherent beauty of an irredeemable paper currency. You may take it to the farmers and laborers of any district between the two oceans. I will meet you on any stump with it. We will take a vote to learn which money, so called, the people of the United States most approve; and, Mr. Speaker, they will prefer the gold every time, always, everywhere, until in some way, by your legislation or without your legislation, that paper can be exchanged at their will, not at yours, but at their own will for gold.

I have received a letter from a farmer in my district, recommending me not to vote for a single measure that looks to the depreciation of paper. I ask the Clerk to read a few sentences of it. It is from a farmer who works with his own hands and who also employs others who work upon his farm; who is not only a farmer himself but the son of a farmer, married a farmer's daughter, and has lived on a farm from the day he first saw land.

* * * * * * *

Now I suppose that it is a foregone conclusion that the Senate will, as a sort of compromise, concur in the reissue of the forty-four millions retired by McCulloch. I do not like such compromises. I do not like the theory of the expansionists. Aside from the constitutionality of the act, it seems to me unwise to increase an irredeemable currency. The world's money is the only true basis. The result will be slightly enhanced prices all around. So far as I am individually concerned I do not object, as manual labor, which I buy, is the last commodity to feel the inflation. You may retort that every quarter-section in the Union is virtually mortgaged for the payment of this issue of paper. I should as soon think that in the future the paper might become as worthless as continental rags. Suppose that the next Congress should be (and it is not improbable) of a parti-colored and many-hued complexion politically, and succeeding Congresses likewise incongruous; man may not fathom their doings, nor may one say that they will not go even to the length of repudiation.

Pardon me for lecturing you in this forward manner, but you must remember that I am one of the sovereign people, and public servants feel the popular pulse with renewed watchfulness this winter.

Mr. KASSON. Producers by labor want good money, and they want more of it; but in demanding more of it, they demand that you shall by your legislation guard it in such a way that you do not depreciate it, and that guard is to be found in what you do with your greenbacks. The danger is not in giving us the banking facilities we want. We need those banking facilities and demand them. But what is wanted is, that you shall guard your greenbacks as the center of the whole system, and that you shall prepare to redeem your pledges, that you shall do something to bring us back in the future to specie payments, and to make your paper money as good as your gold money. That is the want of the producers and laborers, on whom the losses from depreciated paper ultimately and fatally fall.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to do that only by issuing a new kind of paper, just as is done in San Domingo or Hayti, and in some other countries, where, when one kind of paper money gets depreciated too much, another is substituted; and by and by that is depreciated also. Observe the statements officially sent to me, as follows, of which I have no time to speak in detail:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I send you herewith a copy of the statement to which I referred, prepared from examination of late quotations and authentic reports.

In San Domingo it will be seen that there are three different depreciated currencies at the present time in circulation, the latest having a discount of but from 10 to 20 per cent.; the next earlier being so depreciated that thirty dollars in currency are worth but one dollar in silver; and still earlier the paper so depreciated that four hundred dollars of it are fixed by decree as equivalent to one dollar of silver, the tendency of the successive issues of irredeemable currency being to gradually and rapidly diminish in value and their place to be supplied by new issues, for the time being, current at rates nearer to the normal.

Very truly, yours,

E. B. ELLIOTT.

Hon. JOHN A. KASSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Paper money of different countries; late quotations.—United States, 10 to 12 per cent. discount; Austria, 10 per cent. discount; Greece, 12 per cent. discount; Italy, 11 per cent. discount; Russia, 16 per cent. discount; Cuba, 44 per cent. discount; Hayti, 99⅔ per cent. discount. The Republic of Hayti has 300,000,000 piasters or dollars of paper money. The rate of exchange is authoritatively established at 300 paper dollars for 1 coin dollar. The value in the market is 250 paper dollars for 1 coin dollar. San Domingo, (see report of the United States commission, 1871,) 10 to 20 per cent. discount on the new paper money, latest issue. "Credit notes," so called, an earlier issue, are received by the government at the rate fixed by decree, of thirty dollars for one dollar silver, 96⅔ per cent. discount. "Treasury notes," so called, a still earlier issue, are received by the government at the rate fixed by decree, of $400 to $1 silver, (99¾ per cent. discount.)

Paper money issued by former governments of San Domingo is valueless.

E. B. E.

The proposition in the eighth section of the bill is honest, but extremely timid, and leaves the great volume of greenbacks still unstable in value, and is itself unstable. But there is a mode in which the legal-tender currency can be guarded and strengthened as I have urged. I have time to point it out only by a brief explanation.

To-day the value of the greenback is less than gold because its purchasing power is less. It represents now eighty-eight cents of the gold dollar. If I owe $1,000 to be paid to-morrow, I pay it with a real value of $880 computed in gold. The gold dollar has 25.8 grains of gold. The greenback represents only about 22.5 grains of gold. To-morrow you resume specie payments. I then pay 2,580 grains of gold on my debt, instead of 2,250 grains which it would cost me to pay it to-day. This is the element of hardship to the debtor class in so speedy a resumption as to put too large an advance in value on the debtor at once.

Can we then advance the value of the currency so as not to oppress the debtor, and yet arrive at specie payment by a slow process, and by steady steps?

In my judgment it is practicable, and needs only an act of legislative duty, in pursuance of the pledges you have now in your statutes.

The amount of gold now in the country is only enough to meet the demand for it. Gold goes where it is wanted, and leaves the country which does not want it. California uses it and keeps all she wants. Iowa does not use it, and consequently keeps none of it. As soon as additional gold is wanted here for any purpose it will come here by inevitable laws of trade. At present its chief uses, east of the Rocky Mountains, are to pay customs duties and the interest on the public debt—a movement into and out of the United States Treasury, with growing reserves in the Treasury.

Suppose the value of gold (in currency) on the 1st of July next is 112. You direct the Treasurer for four months from that date to exchange, on request, gold for legal-tender at that rate; for the next four months at the rate of 111½; for the next four months at 111; and so on, increasing the amount of gold exchanged for greenbacks by ½ per cent. every four months. Of course you arrive at equal values in eight years. The annual advance is so moderate as not to be equal to the difference in rates of interest easily paid by debtors. It does not, therefore, oppress them. But, if practicable, its great benefit to industry and commerce will be found in the absolute stability of value given to the currency from this time on. Gold speculations will cease, because the values will be stable, and the Government will supply the wants of legitimate trade. One-half the advantages of resumption will be gained at once. The other half of the advantage is steadily approaching, and will arrive with par values.

Assuming that both these results are desirable, I ask now, is the system practicable?

The first objection occurring arises from fear that parties will run upon the Treasury gold for speculative purposes on the street.

1. The amount of the surplus coin in the Treasury, which may be safely taken to guide our judgment, will appear from the following tabular statement of the amount of gold, currency, and certificates of deposit in the Treasury at the end of each month, for the past fourteen months, compiled from the Treasury monthly reports:

Year and month.	Coin.	Currency.	Certificates.
1873—January	62, 342, 604 38	7, 007, 454 01	24, 246, 500 00

March	69, 537, 376 59	2, 653, 840 43	24, 141, 000 00
April	76, 976, 440 00	2, 997, 871 25	24, 787, 400 00
May	75, 588, 316 16	6, 065, 799 40	30, 448, 600 00
June	87, 507, 402 68	9, 783, 529 77	39, 460, 000 00
July	80, 144, 185 98	9, 316, 689 48	42, 831, 800 00

October	82, 313, 581 43	4, 312, 155 99	27, 569, 880 00
November	83, 709, 987 44	1, 296, 440 28	30, 220, 600 00
1874—January	85, 359, 369 34	4, 781, 208 68	48, 004, 000 00
Total	1, 102, 686, 034 35	82, 323, 037 48	451, 969, 460 00
Average	78, 761, 859 59	5, 880, 216 46	32, 283, 532 85

These resources are very large, much beyond any probable, if not possible, combinations of individuals to control.

2. But you further provide that in any possible emergency of the Treasury a certificate may be issued in lieu of coin, which shall be receivable by the Government for all purposes where coin is required by law. And as these certificates will serve for customs duties, they would equally supply the chief demand of legitimate commerce.

3. Speculators could not gain by drawing gold in advance of the immediate needs of commerce; for by waiting they gain ½ per cent. in gold over the rate of the previous period.

4. As regular commerce can supply its wants at the Treasury it will not go to the speculator at all. The gold exchange is no longer of use.

These considerations seem to me to fully meet this objection.

The following bill shows in legal form the necessary provisions:

A bill to enhance the value of the legal-tender notes of the United States until their value shall be equal to gold, and providing for future resumption of specie payments.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the —— day of ——, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause gold coin to be exchanged for legal-tender notes of the United States, at the rate of $100 in coin for —— dollars in notes, whenever the same shall be presented for that purpose at any sub-treasury of the United States, in sums of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, and said rate of exchange shall continue for four months thereafter; and thenceforward said exchanges shall be made at a rate ½ of 1 per cent. less for each successive period of four months, until the exchange shall be made at par, dollar for dollar. The legal-tenders thus received into the Treasury shall be held and disposed of as other general funds in the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in like manner, cause legal-tender notes in the Treasury to be exchanged for coin when such coin shall be presented for that purpose in sums of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, at the rate of ½ of 1 per cent. less than the rate for the time being, as established by the preceding section for the exchange of gold in the Treasury for legal-tender notes. The coin thus received shall be held and disposed of as other coin in the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That whenever at the Treasury, or at any sub-treasury of the United States, there shall not be proper funds on hand sufficient to meet all demands that may be made upon it for either of the funds named in the two preceding sections of this act, certificates shall be given to the applicant for exchange, redeemable at the treasury from which it issued, which certificate shall be receivable in payment of all dues to the Government which are payable in the funds called for by such certificate. And in all cases where such certificates shall be issued, the value paid therefor shall be set apart and retained on deposit for the purpose of redeeming such certificates when they shall be, respectively, presented for that purpose.

SEC. 4. That whenever, under the operations of this act, legal-tenders shall become exchangeable at the Treasury for gold at par, it shall be the duty of all the national banks of the United Stases having currency issued by them outstanding, to redeem the same in gold upon demand therefor by the holder.

The bill also provides for receiving gold into the Treasury in exchange for legal-tenders, but at a rate lower than the other exchangeable value, in order to prevent speculation near the time of changing rates at the end of any one period.

Mr. Speaker, I present this proposition for the consideration of the House, as preferable to the eighth section of the bill. This creates a new paper money of unstable value, and will only confuse the transactions of commerce—still instability of money value; still something new to speculate in. When we move for the redemption of our pledges, let us do it boldly, steadily, perseveringly, and without contraction. The purchasing power of gold, the most stable of standards, is slowly diminishing, nearly at the rate of ½ per cent. per annum, for the last twenty years. The regular demands for currency for our increasing business are steadily enhancing its value. Both causes help us to the point of resumption. Let us adopt a steady policy and keep to it, slowly advancing the value of the legal-tenders, and both the honor of the Government and the prosperity of our people will be maintained.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has expired, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa. I am not in favor of the Senate bill for precisely the reason which he has advanced in the last part of his argument. I am in favor, sir, of a return to specie payments. I am in favor of making such legislation here as will look toward stability, as will not necessarily have to be changed by the next session of Congress. I am, therefore, in favor, if a proper amendment can be made to it, of the House bill for free banking, and opposed to the Senate bill. I do not believe in this parceling out from time to time a little more currency.

I think we should stop now and fix the rule by which Congress should be governed in the future in regard to this class of legislation. There can be nothing more dangerous than that the business interest of the country, in each succeeding session of Congress, should be at a stand-still, waiting to know what Congress is to do about the finances. Whatever legislation we enter upon here, let us enter upon it with a determination to move in that direction and to follow it steadily until we reach a specie basis.

Mr. Speaker, the importance of the proper settlement of the question under consideration, the vital interests involved, the necessity for stability in laws regulating the currency of the nation, demand at our hands careful and critical examination of the bill under consideration, in order that the rights and interests of all—of the debtor and the creditor, of the rich and the poor, of the producer and the consumer, of the employer and the employé—may be fully and justly protected.

As legislators, in discussing or voting upon questions of finance we should always have in view the rights of the debtor and creditor class, and within our constitutional power endeavor to so legislate as to hold the scales of justice evenly balanced between them and not by undue expansion aid the debtor to the injury of the creditor, or by undue contraction ruin the debtor for the benefit of the creditor.

THE FOUR HUNDRED MILLIONS.

I voted for the bill fixing the limit of the United States Treasury notes at $400,000,000, but by so doing I did not intend to indicate that I was in favor of inflation, or that I was necessarily committed to the idea that that amount of legal-tender notes should be kept permanently in circulation until we should reach a specie basis; but, on the contrary, I was then, as I am now, in favor of a gradual retirement of these notes, and allowing the place filled by them now to be occupied by the national-bank note, secured by the gold-interest bond of the United States; and, either by direct law, or by the necessary result of the retirement of the legal-tenders, compelling the banks, in the not distant future, to redeem in coin.

The Secretary of the Treasury has held that the limit fixed by the law was $400,000,000; that has been the holding of that Department since the withdrawal of the legal-tenders under the act of August 20, 1866, and the suspension of such withdrawal by the act of February 4, 1868. This holding of the Department was well known and understood, and while the correctness of it has been frequently discussed in and out of Congress, no legislative action was taken to determine the true construction to be given to the past legislation, thereby leaving the course to be pursued entirely under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and subject only to the judicial interpretation of the courts as to the true construction of his power, or compelling Congress to remedy the action that might be taken by a curative act.

The Secretary of the Treasury under the power which he claimed to be vested in him had, during the pressure of the financial emergency last fall and winter, issued $26,000,000 of the $400,000,000, or of the reserve of $44,000,000, as claimed by the Secretary.

If the construction of the Secretary was correct, then we were simply declaring the law to be as claimed by him, and not in fact increasing the amount authorized by existing laws. If incorrect, the effect of our action is to cover the irregularity of the issue of the $26,000,000 and prevent the deplorable consequence that could not but result from the illegal, because unauthorized, issue of that amount of paper purporting to be money and a legal tender, paid out as such by the Government and floated with the currency of the country by innocent parties in good faith. I did not feel authorized by my vote thus to taint the whole legal-tender currency of the country, and therefore I voted as I then thought, and still think, and will so vote on the pending bill, to cure the evil and legalize the act if unauthorized.

This still leaves $18,000,000 of what has been denominated the reserve in the Treasury, and unless there should be another emergency it will remain there. I have no desire to call it out, but if it should be called out I should object to its being rapidly and unnecessarily withdrawn. I am not in favor of this emergency power vested in any man, and therefore am opposed to the reserve power.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER.

With the decisions of the Supreme Court in Hepburn vs. Griswold, 8 Wallace, and the Legal-tender cases in 12 Wallace, as my guide, and my oath here as a legislator to support the Constitution of the United States, I could not, if I would, vote for any issue of legal-tender notes in excess of the $400,000,000 issued to maintain the credit, support the armies in the field, preserve the Government, and maintain its unity and integrity. The power to issue legal-tenders was essentially a war power, a forced loan upon the creditor class, and cannot exist, for the necessity cannot exist in times of peace.

THE VALUE OF THE LEGAL-TENDERS.

It has been said upon this floor, sir, that the legal-tender note represents no value, that it is a bastard note. That if A sells a house and lot to B, and takes B's note, that note represents value. If A, getting hard up, goes to his bankers and deposits it with them and receives therefor the notes of his bank, those bank-notes represent value, because, forsooth, they represent the value of the house and lot paid for by B's note in the safe of the bank. If the house was sold for twice its real value, then the bank-notes would on that line of argument be seriously inflated; if it should burn down the notes would be worthless. I want no bank-notes liable to such fluctuations and changes.

I had supposed that the United States Treasury notes did represent value. As surely as that flag represents, not only here but through the world, the unity of these States, just so surely, sir, do the United States Treasury notes represent the cost of life and blood and treasure, the priceless value of that unity of States. Do not let it be said on this floor that the United States Treasury notes do not represent a value of a far higher, far greater nature than the paltry price of a house and lot. There is no comparison between the two values.

I would, however, appreciate the market value of these notes by receiving them for duties on imports; but I am met with the act of February 25, 1862, providing for the sinking fund, containing a pledge on the part of the Government to maintain its credit. I would not, sir, violate this pledge; but as it does not now require all of the duties collected on imported goods to pay the coin interest, I would provide that so much of the duties on imported goods as are not required to pay the coin interest on the public debt might be received in the Treasury notes.

The amount estimated as receivable for customs for the year ending July 1, 1875, is $180,000,000. If one-fourth of this amount was paid in Treasury notes we would still receive in the Treasury coin to the amount of $135,000,000. The estimate for the interest on the coin debt is $98,000,000, thus paying that interest and leaving in the Treasury the sum of $37,000,000 coin annually.

We have also of Treasury notes $45,000,000; I would retire of this sum the amount of the sinking fund. The amount estimated for that purpose for the year ending July 1, 1875, is $30,000,000, thus meeting the provisions of the act of February 25, 1862, both as to the sinking fund and the coin interest, and leaving in the Treasury $37,000,000 of coin and $15,000,000 of Treasury notes to be applied to the public service.

By so doing the Government would be treating its own promises to pay as money, would be compelled to cease making gold a commodity, and would enhance the value of the Treasury note by placing both it and gold on the same basis, and by retiring each year of the Treasury notes an amount equal to the appropriation to the sinking fund, provided there shall be an equal amount of bank-notes issued.

I believe it to be the duty of the Government to avoid contraction; that the Treasury notes should not be withdrawn until something else in the line of currency as well secured can be provided to take its place, and therefore I am in favor of the national-bank currency.

I would make it free to all, not only for the purpose of avoiding monopoly, but for the further reason that I do not believe that Congress can well ascertain and properly determine the quantity of money required for the business interests of the country. I would provide a safe currency for the bill-holder, with redemption in legal-tenders, and then leave the matter to the business demand.

I cannot vote for the bill under consideration as it now stands. Section 8 with its gold-coin note is subject to many objections. It is an acknowledgment that the legal-tender note is not payable in coin. It introduces a third class of paper into our currency if those golden promises can or will be used for such purposes. It opens the door to favorites or rings to make monthly fortunes. There can be no question that the gold notes will be worth at least 5 per cent. above gold as soon as issued—a small profit of $100,000 to the fortunate one who has drawn the golden prize. It will tend to enrich the Wall street operator at the expense of the people, and will place $24,000,000 of these golden promises a year in the hands of the gold operators.

It has but one desirable feature, and that is it retires legal-tenders, and I desire to retain that feature; and have introduced an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute to section 8, involving the propositions I have heretofore referred to; that is, it makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to receive 25 per cent. of the duties on imported goods in Treasury notes, and provides for retiring into the sinking fund the amount of the annual appropriation for that purpose.

I desire to glance briefly at two objections that I have heard urged to this course.

First. That it will, by making a less demand for coin, have a tendency to reduce the quantity retained in the country.

Second. That it will reduce the tariff by receiving a depreciated currency in lieu of coin in payment of duties.

These are all the objections I have heard from any of those who favor a retirement of the legal-tenders to the amendment proposed. I think these objections are not sound. The amount of gold required for customs duties will not be diminished by the course proposed. The Government supplies more than one-fourth of the demand by the sale of gold. That sale would not be made; and that amount of gold would simply avoid being turned over and passed through the custom-house twice instead of once.

The second objection assumes as a fact that the difference between gold and Treasury notes will not be reduced; if not, the object of the proposition will fail; if it is reduced, as I believe it will be, the effect of the reduction will be slight, indeed, and constantly diminishing.

I consider the proposition that the tariff should be based upon the rise and fall of gold, and that the tariff will be increased by enhancing the price of gold, as seriously objectionable. It is not altogether an evil resulting from the legal-tenders or paper currency; but largely from the fact that the Government has been interested in keeping up the distinction between legal-tenders and gold—selling gold and buying bonds not matured; letting the floating debt stand and retiring unmatured obligations. The floating debt should be retired first. Every principle of justice and equity requires it; and let us set about doing it. Adopt here some uniform, settled course that will look toward solid ground; toward specie payment. And having adopted a course let us adhere to it steadily and uniformly, and thereby arrest the constant fluctuations and depressions that will necessarily result from the changing moods of Congress. Stability in the laws relating to finance we must reach, or there will be no certainty in contract obligations or business enterprise.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I have been a quiet listener for long and weary days to the conflict in this House between capital and labor, between wealth and poverty, between the few thousand favorites of fortune who possess more than half of the entire wealth of my country and the million sons of toil whose labor and frugality produce that wealth.

Sir, of the forty million citizens of the United States represented on this floor far less than one million have surplus capital, have money to loan. Thirty-nine millions, in some form or other, must operate with borrowed capital.

One million creditors: thirty-nine million debtors! Debtors for the time being; debtors till they coin the sweat of their brows into gold wherewith to pay their debts; debtors till seed-time and harvest transform the golden grain into currency; debtors till the felled forest, transformed in a thousand mills and conveyed in a thousand vessels, supplies the ever-increasing necessities of civilization; debtors till the earth from its myriad subterranean passages has rendered to toil its infinite wealth, hidden away since the foundations of the world; debtors till the ceaseless manipulations of human skill and labor have converted the crude material into the endless forms of beauty and utility which our humanity requires.

Mr. Speaker, while we deliver profound dissertations upon political economy and finance, millions of our fellow-citizens are lacking employment. Hundreds of thousands know not where to look for work. Thousands are fed day by day from charity. Want is creeping through the land. Hunger is reaching out its skinny fingers for bread. Business everywhere paralyzed, except in the money-lender's office and beneath the three balls.

And what are we doing in the mean time? We, the sworn Representatives of these toiling millions of confiding citizens, what do we propose in this hour of their trial, of their want, of this paralysis of our country's industry and prosperity? What panacea do these representatives of hoarded wealth propose and urge and grow frantic about? Listen, ye toiling millions of my countrymen, to the remedy offered. Legislation which tends directly to add 12 per cent. to your indebtedness and 12 per cent. to the hoarded wealth of your creditors, by forced resumption of specie payment, and even then would force further from your reach the means of liquidation of that accumulated indebtedness. Sir, the conflict between hoarded wealth and patient industry comes early to this new nation in this New World. I doubt if the people will quietly submit. They have not yet ground long enough in the prison-house of the Philistines to bear these burdens unmoved. They are not sufficiently accustomed to make sport in the temple of Dagon for the golden-robed lords and princes. Even in their alleged blindness they may bow themselves upon the pillars of the money-changers and overwhelm all in a common ruin.

Sir, capital is cautious; wealth is wary; Dives is crafty. Let not their representatives presume too much upon the patience and long-suffering of the millions whom they would force into idleness and want. From every quarter come ominous signs of warning! All around we hear low murmurs of dissatisfaction.

Scarcely had the distinguished Representative of the richest city of its size on this continent proclaimed in this House that he would hold no more companionship with those who would vote to give more currency to the people, than the citizens of his own State took him at his word, and, with sorrow, withdrew from his communion and hid senatorial honors from his longing vision. Even the sturdy citizens of the Granite State cast off a party whose leaders in this House have forgotten the grand mission of the republican party to care for the poor and lowly and protect the toiling millions from the encroachments of monopoly and wealth.

Mr. Speaker, everywhere industry is paralyzed; everywhere there is stagnation of all business enterprises; everywhere is enforced idleness and approaching want; everywhere are heard murmurs of fear and discontent.

I solemnly believe that wise legislation in the direction indicated by the votes of a majority in this House and the Senate will restore confidence, will revive business, will bring prosperity and not adversity, will avert calamities whose coming will cause the ears of men to tingle and their hearts to shudder. With this belief, I refuse to yield to the demands of the money-changers. I will cast my vote in the interest of the innumerable sons of labor and toil in whose ranks I was born, in whose hardships I have shared, to whose homely but generous heart-beats every pulsation of mine responds, and to represent whose interests worthily, however feebly, would be the crowning glory of my humble ambition.

Sir, let the governors of States dictate to subservient Legislatures their high-sounding manifestoes, in not overelegant language, of instructions to this Congress in furtherance of the memorials of merchant princes and millionaires. I cannot tell how submissive others may become, but for me, I will await with confidence the verdict of that loyal, enterprising, intelligent host of toilers and laborers of the earth whose confiding trust may indeed be outraged, but whose avenging wrath will be terrible if once aroused.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to contribute anything to the financial theories of this House. I rise for a single purpose, and that is to make a protest in the name of the public integrity and the public faith against what it is proposed to do on this floor. I have no time or inclination to discuss with any gentleman the question whether whatever the Government chooses to call money is money; whether by putting a Government stamp upon a piece of paper you can make it money. I believe that you might just as well say that you make a man an honest or sensible man by giving him a certificate that he is elected to Congress. I have nothing or very little to say to gentlemen who speak of the excellence and absolute superiority of a currency that is based upon the credit of this great Government or of this great nation. All I have to say about that is that you do not give the credit of the Government to promises which the Government steadily refuses to take any measures to perform or keep. We have not any currency with the credit of the Government attached to it, unless the Government keeps its faith with its creditors.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that you may just as well talk about making more time as of making money, unless you give it substantial value. We had the other day a misprint in a bill by which it was made to read the 32d January, and it was amended by making it the 31st. And it seems to me more time was very much needed by the people of this country; that this House has hardly time to transact its business, and that Congress should be enabled to add a few days to its year by legislation. And if Congress should do so, as when the new style was substituted for the old there were some ten days dropped I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury would bring forward those days, which he would be pleased to call his reserve, and add it to the number of days in the year.

In what I say I speak merely on behalf of my constituents, and not for any section; for I trust I shall never appeal to any sectional feeling in this House. I hope our late civil war has forever destroyed and abolished that, and I recognize no relation except to my constituents and my State and the people of the whole United States. And to any measure from Louisiana, Nebraska, or California I shall give as thorough and firm a support, if I believe it an honest and just measure, as to a measure that is favored by Maine, Vermont, or Rhode Island. I believe that the people of my section of the country are willing and desirous that the people of every other section shall have all the facilities, all the benefits which the legislation of the country can give them. What we want is to have money, to have money which has solid value; and the protest which I wish to make here is against issuing in any form any species of paper promises in lieu of money till the Government keeps its faith by making those promises equal to gold. That is the whole substance of it.

Now I wish to ask this House, are you not yielding to a temporary newspaper clamor, or to a mere popular ripple, the result of a financial panic? Burke once said in regard to such a clamor, that the grasshoppers in the field made a great deal of noise while the great British oxen lay and chewed their cuds, wondering what all the row was about. The people of this country, Mr. Speaker, will not long sustain anything but the faithful performance of public promises and the keeping of the public faith.

I tell my friends on the other side of the House that the democratic party of this country—I was trained a whig but I became converted later in life to the soundness of their financial theories—I tell them that they will, if they find a part of their Representatives on this floor betraying the old democratic faith, be crying out for one hour of Andrew Jackson. I ask my republican friends and associates, are you prepared to go to the country again upon a record which shows that you have not kept and have repudiated the solemn pledge of your party? Is this House, as a part of the American Legislature, willing to put upon itself the stigma of repudiating the pledged public faith?

Mr. Speaker, the first act signed by the present occupant of the Executive chair pledged the faith of this nation to the holders of its promises that measures should be taken for redeeming those promises in gold at the earliest practicable period. Both political parties have promised it again and again to the people who sent us as their Representatives here. Every man on this floor knows that to add in any form to our currency irredeemable paper, or paper for the redemption of which no provision has been made, postpones and puts off the day of keeping that sacred pledge of the public faith. We on this side of the House and the people whom we represent have elected to the office of President of the United States upon this basis the present incumbent. We have passed that act, the first which received his signature, pledging the United States to its creditors to redeem at the earliest practicable period their promises to pay dollars. He has in every message that he has sent to Congress given in his full adhesion to those acts. Are you going—Mr. Speaker, is this House going to send him up a bill to sign, by signing which he is to abandon, renounce, and break every pledge which his party and which the people of the country have required of him? Are we going to break that pledge for ourselves?

My protest is simply this for myself, that I will vote for no bill that adds one dollar more to the currency for any purpose that is not accompanied by such means taken for its redemption in specie as to bring us nearer to specie payments. We have no moral right to do it. It is a very questionable proposition, much discussed, whether we have a constitutional right to do it. It is a breach of good faith to do it. You may take away all banking facilities from New England and put them where you please, rather than do it with my consent.

Mr. Speaker, with provision for the redemption in specie of any currency issued I have no objection to free banking. I have no objection to anything which will increase the circulation to any extent that it can be maintained in the country and in any part of the country, provided it is to be an honest circulation that is worth what it professes to be; and I solemnly ask the House to pause, and not to pass, in advance, a bill for increasing the amount of paper money, while the promises to pay of the Government are still unprovided for and when it simply adds to the broken promises with which the atmosphere is hazy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NEGLEY. It is clearly apparent that it is the desire of the House, as it is certainly the desire of the whole country, that we should reach a speedy solution of this question by a vote. I therefore simply ask permission of the House to print my remarks; and yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

There was no objection, and the leave to print was granted. (See Appendix.)

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, it is not of course possible, in the fifteen minutes allowed by the special order of the House for debate, to discuss at large the merits of the bill before the House. All that I can expect to do, therefore, during that short time will be to vindicate in a general way the opinions that I have formed, after careful deliberation upon the important measure before us and kindred measures connected with it.

No man can have participated in the proceedings of this House for the last fortnight without discovering that the doctrine of increasing the irredeemable paper currency of the country is the popular cry and order of the day. The mania for inflation seems to have taken possession of both branches of the National Legislature. Inflation has pentrated the rooms of the committees of this House; it has presided over their deliberations; and the spirit of inflation has been plainly stamped upon the principal measures that have been introduced either by committees or individual members for the consideration and action of this House. We hear everywhere throughout these halls and upon the floor of Congress the cry "Give us more currency; give us more greenbacks; give us more national-bank notes." Under such circumstances it would be far more agreeable to me not to struggle against an adverse current, but to remain a passive spectator of events which I am powerless to resist, or if my convictions of duty and the sentiments of my constituents permitted it, to jump into the stream and swim along with the wind and tide in my favor, leaving the future to take care of itself. But, sir, on this most important occasion my own conscientious convictions of duty are in entire harmony and accord with the sentiments of the people whom I have the honor to represent upon this floor, and these require that I should enter my earnest protest and remonstrance against all measures tending to postpone a return of specie payments, and to increase the volume of irredeemable paper money in every form.

I have been sorry to hear sneering allusions made on this floor to the action of the chief magistrate of the great State of New York, a distinguished, venerable, and patriotic statesman, whose name is a pass-word to confidence and regard wherever it is known. And I trust that my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] thoughtlessly alluded to the Legislature of New York as a "subservient" body of men. Sir, the governor and the Legislature of New York may not be popular with certain gentlemen on this floor. But I tell them that their interests and the interests of the people of New York are the interests of the West and of the South. We are one people and must share one destiny. Our misfortune is their misfortune; any breach of the national honor that reflects discredit upon us reflects discredit upon them also; and I will add that the members of that Legislature are independent, fearless, honorable men, the peers of any gentleman on this floor.

I have observed with regret that the divisions upon this financial question have been not according to old party lines, but that they have been marked with those ominous indications, divisions according to sectional and geographical boundaries. I am not at liberty to doubt as to the wishes of my constituents on the questions relating to the currency. In the great commercial emporium, which has the deepest interest in having a sound financial policy established by this Government, the business men, the merchants and commercial men, have spoken with an emphasis and unanimity scarcely ever paralleled. The voice of my constituents comes to me in petitions numerously signed by the merchants, bankers, and business men, from large and enthusiastic meetings, from resolutions of chambers of commerce and boards of trade, from the expressions of leading organs of public opinion, and in every way in which public sentiment is accustomed to make itself manifest.

Only the day before yesterday the people of my State, so sneeringly alluded to, the four millions of New York, spoke in the only way they could speak, in time to be heard by Congress through their representatives. The chief magistrate, influenced by what he regarded as the exigencies of the case, in language earnest and dignified called upon the Legislature to do what it might to arrest the progress of measures which it was believed would bring discredit upon the country. He condemns in energetic and emphatic language all measures pending before Congress looking to an increase of legal-tender notes, or irredeemable notes of national banks, as violating the national faith, and compelling creditors to receive their pay in a depreciated currency contrary to the principles of justice. The Legislature at once responded; and how did they respond? With most signal unanimity; in the assembly there was not a single dissenting voice, and in the senate there were but three.

I call attention to the message of the governor and the resolutions of the Legislature, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Executive Chamber, April 7, 1874.

To the Legislature:

I deem it due to the interest and honor of the State to call upon you, as its chosen representatives, to take into consideration the propositions before Congress in regard to the currency. Though yet immature, and requiring the concurrent action of both Houses to give them the validity of law, they have, nevertheless, received in each such partial sanction as to excite serious alarm as to the result. In my annual message in January last I expressed the earnest hope that the paper circulation issued by the Government would be curtailed, and that early steps would be taken to resume specie payments.

I did not anticipate that so extraordinary a proposition as that of inflating the currency by adding to outstanding legal-tender notes, or by authorizing further issue of national-bank paper, would be seriously made. In view of the purpose which has been indicated to enlarge the volume of paper of both descriptions, and to repudiate all attempts to re-establish the standard of specie—a policy, as I sincerely believe, fraught with wide-spread ruin to the industry of the country and with imminent danger to its credit—I invoke your interposition to contribute all in your power to prevent its adoption. Your opinion, representing as you do more largely than the Legislature of any other State the financial and commercial interests of the Union, should carry with it great weight.

The flagrant injustice of the proposed measure will be the more apparent when you consider that, if adopted without repealing the legal-tender act, the results will be not only to depreciate the paper currency still further, but to compel its acceptance in payment of debt, thus openly violating the solemnly proclaimed pledges of the Government five years ago to redeem its notes in specie at the earliest practicable period, impairing the obligation of contracts, and consummating what the Constitution prohibts to the States as an act of moral and political turpitude. To degrade the currency, and at the same time to compel the people to receive it as equivalent to specie, would be the most tyrannical exercise and abuse of financial power of which civilized government has ever been guilty in time of peace. It differs in no essential respect either under its moral or its practical effects from a degradation of the standard of specie by an adulteration of the national coin.

Five years ago the sense of rectitude would have revolted at the suggestion of such an act of perfidy; but a persistence in wrong and injustice rarely fails to reconcile further wrong to the thought first and to the purpose afterward. If, spurning away all the teachings of history and trampling under foot all the maxims of political justice, we adopt a policy as fraudulent as it is demoralizing, our successors will look back on our conduct with humiliation and shame. The millions of depreciated and irredeemable paper, if issued as proposed, will, by a law of distribution which no human power can control, be poured into the city of New York to uphold and stimulate stock-gambling; to glut the channels of industry, embarrass all honest transactions of business; to cause reactions in the various departments of labor by which the working classes are thrown out of employment, and to shake to its foundations the fabric of the public credit. Against the introduction of such an instrument of dishonor and calumny we should enter our solemn protest as we would against any other flood of contamination. I speak with a clear understanding of the force of my words. I believe and trust you will concur with me in the opinion that the emergency demands the plainest and most emphatic language. I therefore recommend such an expression on your part as may comport with the dignity of the Legislature and as you may deem due to the interest of your constituents. I am not without hope that a timely declaration of your views to be presented to Congress through the Senators and Representatives from this State may arrest the torrent of disgrace and disaster with which the country is threatened from this source. If your protests and warnings are unheeded you will have the consolation of reflecting when the evil comes upon us that no effort on your part has been spared to avert it.

JOHN A. DIX.

Whereas his excellency the governor of the State of New York has this day transmitted to the Legislature a special message relating to the inflation of the currency by the General Government, calling attention to the disastrous effect of such action upon the welfare and prosperity of the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That we fully approve and heartily indorse the sentiments expressed in such message; and in view thereof, and of the act of Congress, approved March, 1869, which affirmed that the faith of the United States was solemnly pledged to the payment in coin of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, (known as United States notes,) and that the United States also solemnly pledged its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin; and as this pledge has been repeatedly given, it is the judgment of the Legislature of the State of New York that it is the duty of the Administration of the General Government at Washington and of Congress to stay the pernicious and ruinous policy of increasing the volume of irredeemable paper currency.

And be it further resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to resist, by all efforts in their power, any inflation of the currency through the further issue of circulating notes by the Government or by national banks, and that they be, and are also hereby, requested respectively to promote by all proper measures an early return to specie payments.

And be it further resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit these resolutions, with a copy of his message appended, to the President of the United States, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The Legislature thus confirmed the recommendations of the governor, and called, as they had a right to do without being reproached for it, upon their Senators and Representatives to do what they could to prevent an increase of irredeemable legal-tender notes, or of national-bank notes in any form where no provision is made for redemption in coin.

The bill establishing a legal-tender currency at $400,000,000 was passed without an opportunity for debate. I complain not of that, for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] thought it was proper to have an early and speedy disposition of the question. Gentlemen have very properly regarded that bill as a kindred measure to the one now before the House, and they have therefore discussed and considered them together. The Senate bill that lies upon the Speaker's table blends the two together, and therefore they are necessarily and reasonably to be considered together.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. TREMAIN. I cannot be interrupted. I have no time. If I had a half hour I would yield to the gentleman, but I cannot in the fifteen minutes allowed me.

The bill before the House to a certain extent also blends the two measures, but the provision regulating the amount of legal-tender currency has been anticipated by the bill already passed upon by this House. I voted against the bill increasing the legal-tender currency to $400,000,000 because it was an exercise by Congress of the power to issue such currency in time of peace, because I regarded it as a measure of inflation, and tending to violate the pledges given by the Republican party and by Congress.

If I had had time to elaborate the propositions which I maintain, and consider sound and just in connection with this bill and with that relating to the currency, I should have endeavored to show by authority and by reason the truth of the following positions:

1. That under the solemn pledge made to the public creditors and the nation by Congress immediately after the commencement of General Grant's administration, as contained in the act of March 18, 1869, provision should be made at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of all obligations of the United States notes in coin or its equivalent.

2. That the only contingency which will justify the issue of legal-tender notes, on the part of the Government of the United States, arises from the existence of war; that a resort to such an extreme exercise of constitutional power in time of peace, if the power exists except in war, would be not merely a violation of all sound principles of political economy, but dangerous to the welfare and prosperity of the nation.

3. That the republican party has been placed in possession of supreme political power in this country upon its deliberate pledges to bring about a restoration of specie payments at the earliest possible moment, and any departure from its plighted faith in this regard would call for the stern rebuke of the people, and be attended with the most disastrous results.

4. That when forty-four millions of the notes of the United States had been redeemed in pursuance of the policy of contraction which had been deliberately sanctioned by Congress, the power to reissue the same by the Secretary of the Treasury was a power so great and so capable of abuse that it ought to find support in plain and explicit expressions of the legislative will; whereas in truth it can only be sustained by implication, after resorting to provisions of the statutes that are not explicit or free from ambiguity; that as to that portion of the so-called reserve which has already been issued, the same having been issued in good faith by the financial agent of the Government under the pressure of a supposed necessity, and the Treasury having received the benefit thereof from the public creditors, the honor and good faith of the Government require that the same should be recognized and redeemed; but the issue of any further amount thereof under the sanction of law cannot be justified.

5. That all pending bills, schemes, or proposals to obtain relief from existing embarrassments in commercial affairs by expanding the volume of the currency through the issue of irredeemable notes should receive no favor at the hands of Congress, for the reason that they are at war with the sound principles of finance, recognized and acted upon for centuries by the civilized nations of the earth, that they would unsettle all values, postpone a return to specie payments, and would result, inevitably, at no distant day, in wide-spread embarrassments, losses, and bankruptcy.

6. That at the close of the war the nation was spared the humiliation of seeing its credit dishonored by the adoption of the schemes proposed of paying the national debt in mere paper promises, and has steadily reduced its debt and upheld its credit. So now, by firmly adhering to its pledges and pursuing the ancient and well-trodden paths it will outride the storm, and reviving business and trade will speedily bring back our accustomed prosperity and activity in commerce, trade, and business.

7. That nothing is so essential to the welfare of the country as stability on the part of Congress in reference to its financial policy; and for this reason a prompt and speedy determination of this policy on the part of the national Legislature, upon sound and correct principles, is demanded by every consideration of patriotism, statesmanship and duty.

But, sir, I have been somewhat pained to see the attempt made by my distinguished colleague [Mr. COX] on the floor of this House, to give this question a partisan or political aspect. I concur in the main in the able argument made by him, so far as it complains of the tendency to issue an irredeemable paper currency, and would bring us back to the old-fashioned standard of gold and silver. But I do not think that gentlemen on the other side have any right to make any political issue upon this question. My friend and colleague [Mr. COX] seems himself to have been seized by the spirit of inflation so common here. He was inflated by the intelligence of the result of the election in Connecticut. He was so inflated that he seemed to be ballooning around us in such joy, with such exhiliration and inflation of spirits, that we might have suspected that he had been taking a little laughing gas, if we did not know that he never dealt in gas to any extent.

When my friend alluded to the election in Connecticut as an anti-inflation victory, I thought it was exceedingly proper, exceedingly appropriate on his part, that he should say that he could not mingle his congratulations with his political associates and colleagues on the floor of this House, and that, to use his own language, he would have to go outside and find his place in the bosom of the democracy of the country. It is true that upon the $400,000,000 bill, which is the only measure that can be considered a measure of inflation that passed this House before the Connecticut election, our democratic friends upon the other side are found recorded in this wise: yeas 55, nays 22, not voting 9.

I therefore can understand why my colleague [Mr. COX] desired to find other more congenial society in which to mingle his congratulations upon the anti-inflation victory of Connecticut. But would my friend find the "bosom of the democracy" of the country any more congenial and attractive than his present associates? When has the bosom of the modern democracy heaved with hatred of greenbacks? When has it been inspired with love for the gold and silver standard? It seems to me it was but a few years ago that the democracy proposed to pay off all the debt of the country in greenbacks. If my memory serves me, only a few years have elapsed since Mr. Pendleton, a distinguished leader of that party and a Representative from the State of Ohio, which my colleague [Mr. COX] then represented with credit, proposed in numerous speeches that the gold-bearing bonds of this Government, yea, that every obligation of the Government that had been incurred for the great and sacred purpose of preserving the integrity and honor of this nation in the time of its supreme peril, should be paid off in greenbacks issued by the Government, costing nothing except the paper and ink with which they were manufactured. To that proposal the Democracy responded with great unanimity. I fear that my friend would find the "bosom of the democracy" that he speaks of like the bosom of the historic virgin in the subterranean dungeon of Europe, fair perhaps externally, but fitted with dirks and daggers for him by reason of his love of a specie-paying basis and hatred of greenbacks.

Let not our friends on the other side delude themselves by supposing that the republican party is going to be buried on this question. I hope that my own fears and apprehensions as to the effect of these measures of expansion will be found to be unwarranted in the future. I know the energy of my countrymen. I sympathize with the honest feelings of the West and the South in their desire for more currency. We differ with them honestly as to the effect of this policy of expansion, as proposed in this bill. It is a bill intended to carry out the scheme of increasing the irredeemable paper currency. It is a bill which removes the restrictions imposed upon existing banks by the present law. That law requires that these banks shall keep on hand, at all times, a reserve upon their circulation and deposits equal in the large cities to 25 per cent. upon such circulation and deposits, and in the country equal to 15 per cent. This bill only requires from these banks and from new banks a reserve of 5 per cent. upon the amount of circulation. This releases at once their reserves to the amount probably of $50,000,000, which will be immediately introduced into the circulation of the country. This bill imposes no limits upon the amount of additional circulation which it authorizes. It does not provide for the withdrawal of an amount of greenbacks equal to the new national-bank notes nor any portion of such greenbacks. In short, it appears to me to sanction a deliberate departure from the policy of resumption of specie payments and to launch us upon the ocean of paper money redeemable only in a depreciated currency, from which I fear we shall never return except through panics, commercial embarrassments, bankruptcy, national dishonor, and financial ruin. It has been sustained by my able colleague, [Mr. MERRIAM,] one of the members of the committee; and certainly in alluding last evening to those who had spoken on this bill no one can suppose that I intended to ignore one of the ablest and best-considered speeches that has been delivered on this subject. But I say that gentlemen on the other side must not flatter themselves with the idea that the event so ardently longed for by them, the destruction and death of the republican party, will grow out of this question. I do not wonder that they are prepared to rejoice over the news from Connecticut; for during the last fourteen years they have been, like Nebuchadnezzar, turned out to grass. It is not strange that they should rejoice over every hap-hazard victory, even though it turns out that their governor in Connecticut receives about eight hundred majority less than he did a year ago. It is in these off-years when the republicans are drawn off on such issues as temperance, prohibition, and reform, and do a little business in politics on their own account, that the democracy occasionally slip into power. But let me assure my friends on the other side that the day is not far distant when national issues will come up, when the people will recognize the notes of the old bugle, when you will find the old republican guard coming forth. Then the party that sustained the flag of this country in time of peril, and which saved us from the infamy and eternal disgrace of repudiating the national debt by paying it off according to the Pendletonian scheme with greenbacks, will sweep before it all the opponents of republicanism with the same ease with which the lion aroused shakes the dew from his royal mane.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the time has come to eliminate every subordinate feature in this long debate, and to rally thought about the flag assailed. That is, redemption. The currency presents, above all questions of how or how much? the demand, what? The State of which I am one of many Representatives has by its Legislature made an appeal to Congress. The message of the governor, himself of broad experience in national politics, is hardly less direct and significant than his famous order which flashed like forked lightning in the gloom of 1861: "If any man attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot." Then there was danger to the Union; now its honor and its credit are in peril. Is regard for credit a sentiment? So is patriotism, so was the devotion which saved the Republic. Trample on sentiment, on principle, on honor, and nationality rests upon quicksand.

The bonds of the United States are a first-class security in all the markets of the world. They bear gold, principal and interest. The Treasury has for years been demonstrating the purpose and the ability of the nation to pay them in gold. The Government has issued $26,000,000 in legal tenders since September, but it has paid since July $21,127,986 of the bonded debt. These bonds are a pledge to pay in the future. They cannot always be better than your sacred promise for to-day.

Nor does the case change if you claim that the greenback is not a promise at all, repudiating its plain words, and insist that it is a dollar. For if your legal-tenders are not to be paid, but are money themselves absolutely, the conclusion is not remote that they will serve every purpose of gold, including the payment of bonds and their interest.

Your whole financial structure depends on your treatment of the greenback. Clip off its edges, deny your pledge, interpret it against your creditor, and no euphemism can conceal your dishonor and your shame. Haste has not been required of you. The burden of your obligation has not been crowded on you in war nor in the long years of prosperity since peace returned. Even now no one demands impossibilities. Only be honest. Admit your promise. Do not insult your creditors. Do not brand upon your promise to pay, Never.

Whatever else we can afford, we cannot afford to destroy the faith of our own people in the monetary obligations of the Government. We can get along without borrowing abroad. We can never avoid dependence on our own citizens. Our Government is the creature of law; it must act by law, above all classes and all interests. Superstition in the olden time at every disturbance of nature, said "It is a god." It has changed its object, and now at every disaster cries "It is the Government." It is ignorance or prejudice which regards the Government as Ormuzd or Ahriman, the infinite power of good or the infinite power of evil. But woe betide the day when the Government shall become the undoubted embodiment of pledges deliberately violated, of faith, boldly and without pretense of excuse, trampled upon.

Against the rebellion all that the country had was melted upon the altar of patriotism. The legal-tenders were as much a war measure as the call for troops. So long as that paper money remains afloat and at a discount below gold, it so far exhausts resources which should be husbanded for possible conflict. Every refusal to meet the obligations of those legal-tenders, to stamp them as less than gold, as mere counters without claim for real payment, is a blow at the vital power of the nation. It is less than treason, but akin to it.

Can it be true that the men of the Mississippi Valley, the heirs of empire, celebrate their accession to power upon this floor by this distrust of the resources of the nation, by this infidelity to its solemn pledges? No, no. They have not yet acted. They have not announced their purpose. They have not even finally deliberated. They will not by their votes degrade the nation. They will act bravely. They will recognize the obligations of their own future. Whatever financial policy they may approve, it shall rest only on the rock of absolute fidelity to plighted faith.

For the South and West need to lure capital. The East will keep it if they reject it. Works begun may go forward. The gold premium is an obstacle to new schemes. It is an element of risk and danger, and of assured greater cost. It warns capital and locks it up. It handicaps the South and West in the race. Enterprise struggling and aspiring has now no enemy so fatal as the gold premium. It is upon every improvement a mortgage in excess of the legitimate investment. Will Representatives here impose it upon every growing State, upon every enterprising citizen?

Production hesitates while you have been discussing the finances. Forty million people cannot be idle. They must work; they must produce. Production looks always to the future. Its market is never yesterday, seldom to-day, almost always to-morrow. Thus the gold premium always threatens to be taken out of its reward. That appears on the adverse side of the balance-sheet in every calculation of possibilities. The raw material bought to-day will appear in merchandise months hence, including the gold premium and interest thereon. You may aggravate that premium, but the popular conscience rises higher than legislation, and is confident that at some time your currency will be equal to gold. This discount stops the speed of every spindle, dulls the edge of every tool, and gives a minor key to all the music of industry.

Gentlemen represent industry as wanting more currency. On the contrary, it asks to be relieved from this gold premium, which discourages, burdens, paralyzes. It wants stability; it demands that Congress shall place it upon the natural basis of gold values, and then cease to meddle.

I plead for poverty, which is taxed by this gold premium, and has no means to get a return. I plead for thrift, which finds on all its savings a threat of shrinkage equal to the gold premium. I plead for every person who saves something every year, for he is interested to the extent of that favorable balance in having a better currency. I plead for all who rely on their future, and in their name protest against tainting all the streams of prosperity by the poison of deliberate, inexcusable neglect of justice.

But, argues the advocate of reckless issues of paper money, "We must make it easy for the debtor; let the Shylock creditor look out for himself." Who is this debtor on behalf of whom honor and interest are to be sacrificed? To the front, O debtors, and receive the sympathy of the national legislators! First is the national Government, with obligations of $2,295,058,559.07. But $1,800,000,000 of that is a gold indebtedness. The States, counties, and cities owe $868,676,738; and these, first of all, are the recipients of the sympathy of the tender-hearted here. But over and above them are the railroad companies, whose indebtedness is $1,511,578,944 above their capital. Deduct from these aggregates the amount we owe abroad, about $1,250,000,000, and we find public and corporate indebtedness, not going beyond railroads, over $3,400,000,000 due our own people. Plead for the debtor, O eloquent legislators, but here are your greatest debtors.

The other debts, large as they are, stand for a credit to some persons if for a debit to others. And your brown-stone front is debtor more frequently, and to a larger extent, than the cottage. For debt implies a certain amount of wealth. The pauper can borrow nothing. The day-laborer is not a borrower; the mechanic and artisan are not generally debtors. All of these demand a better currency; all of these have given hostage to the future.

I do not forget the other side, the debtor whose homestead bears a mortgage. Nor do I forget the debtor who owes for the money used in his business. But all of these, who save something of real profit every year, require not sympathy, but justice—an improving currency and a return toward the only measure of value.

No sympathy has been expressed for the borrower, who is crushed by our inflated currency He must pay interest not only on the dollar which he needs, but also upon the gold premium which is worse than useless to him, and all the while the unstable currency disturbs every operation of his business. And who are the borrowers? The young men entering upon production and trade for themselves; the farmers seeking to establish homes for themselves, the driving, creative classes who construct our prosperity. What sections are borrowers? The South and the West. They want more capital. They do not expect to pay their debts for years to come. They will owe more five years hence than now, for their activity all the while demands more of the sinews of trade and production. Every dollar they borrow now will be made dearer to them by the extent of the gold premium. Every western vote here refusing to provide for the return at some time to a specie basis adds to the burden of debt, makes every dollar borrowed cost more, and renders it more difficult to borrow for any purpose, however legitimate. Every southern vote here warns capital away from cotton-fields and sugar plantations, repels loans, and extorts a large share of the savings of the soil for every dollar of borrowed capital.

What is the demand we make? Only not repudiation. If you must have more currency and will make it, provide for paying it in due season. Name your own time and fix your own terms. Set apart your sinking fund, or even one-half of it, to redeem the legal-tenders by purchase until they become at par in gold. Is that too much? Record in any practical, direct way that you will now begin to meet your overdue obligations. As you will, only do it.

What is the alternative? Turkish peasants have built their hovels on the classic soil of Asia Minor. For centuries semi-barbarism has reveled under the shadow of Mount Ida. Goats and wild asses have roamed where fragments and ruins failed to perpetuate buried grandeur. Two thousand years have elapsed, and Schleiman disentombs golden vessels and costly treasures, which illustrate the still more precious story of Troy and of the Greeks. Beware lest you follow the example of the Turkish peasants, and suffer the dust and rubbish of the present to hide from you the wealth on which you tread, the glory which you disregard.

Men of the South and of the West! Do not trample on your opportunities; do not be infidel to your future; do not turn your backs on plighted faith; do not refuse in some way and to some extent to provide for the redemption of the nation's pledges, the legal-tender notes. That will bring out finally $135,000,000 of gold now demonetized. So you may get more money, and we will gladly be your allies. In such an inflation God speed you

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] fears lest France or England or Germany may sell us wares and demand coin therefor. They cannot sell to us unless we choose to buy. They cannot force even our own bonds upon our markets unless we are willing to take them. As the champion of three sixty-five bonds he argues that by them we can make our loans at home. Is it, then, poverty we plead? Do we sue in forma pauperis? Is it necessity which excuses our dereliction, our failure to protect our credit? Our resources, our capacities, our productions repel the imputation. This nation can be honest. It cannot afford longer delay in maintaining the national credit upon obligations past-due.

The West and South claim to be the seat of real power in the future. They, above all, are interested in the national credit. Will they refuse deliberately and without reservation to provide in any way and to any extent for the redemption of the United States notes?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the hour for argument has passed. Four months of debate in the Senate and nearly three weeks of debate in the House have demonstrated that this Congress has determined to reverse the policy of its predecessors, and to enter upon a path new to our recent history, but well known as an old path of disaster and disgrace. I have sought the floor to put on record my protest against the step about to be taken. My opinions may be of but little consequence to others, but I should be untrue to myself, untrue to my deepest convictions, did I not take the occasion to warn the House and the country against what I firmly believe to be the most dangerous and fatal legislation I have known during my service in this House. This legislation is framed to answer a demand for what several gentlemen have called "cheap money." I hope they will take no offense if I say they would more fitly characterize the thing they are aiming at if they would apply to it the old, homely epithet of "cheap and nasty." I hope they will take no offense if I quote in this connection from a late essay of Thomas Carlyle a paragraph which strikingly exhibits my opinion of the result of this measure.

In his essay entitled "Shooting Niagara and after," Carlyle says that one of the three things which are visibly before us is free racing, ere long with unlimited speed, in the career of cheap and nasty:

> Cheap and nasty; there is a pregnancy in that poor, vulgar proverb, which I wish we better saw and valued! It is the rude, indignant protest of human nature against a mischief which, in all times and places, haunts it or lies near it, and which never in any time or place was so like utterly overwhelming it as here and now. Understand, if you will consider it, that no good man did or ever should, encourage "cheapness" at the ruinous expense of unfitness, which is always infidelity, and is dishonorable to a man.—Carlyle's Miscellaneous Works, volume 6, page 373.

I cannot better characterize my opinion of the policy that seems to have been fixed upon by the late votes of the two Houses, than to say that we are proposing now to make a surrender of reality for the sake of an apparent good—to grasp at empty shadows and lose the substance. In discussing the questions which now confront us it is not always easy to find the path of duty. The conditions of the problem before us are so complicated, the subject is so many-sided, that men may well differ in methods. But we ought to follow our measures out to their inevitable consequences, and confront results as well as methods. It was easy to see and to follow the path of duty, when citizens were called upon to decide by the wager of battle between the destruction of the nation and its salvation.

Next to the great achievements of the nation in putting down the rebellion, destroying its cause, and reuniting the Republic on the principle of liberty and equal rights to all, was that series of financial achievements by which the enormous charges of the war were paid, the debt funded, the public credit maintained, and the nation launched upon its career of prosperity. The financial perils through which we have passed were almost equal to the direst perils of the war. Trace the steps by which the nation came up through its dangers to the basis of safety and peace.

There is a fellowship among the virtues by which one great, generous passion stimulates another. When the patriotism of the people had arisen to the height of the sublime in their purpose to put down the rebellion, they manifested an equally noble purpose of meeting all their obligations incurred in the sacred work. Under the pressure of an overmastering necessity, and upon that plea alone, the nation issued its Treasury notes, and made them a legal tender in payment of debts; but by the most solemn sanctions they gave their pledge to the world that the volume should never exceed $400,000,000, and that at the earliest possible moment they would redeem their promises and restore the currency to the standard of the Constitution.

Scarcely had the echoes of their cannon died away when they set about the work of redeeming these pledges. In 1866, by the almost unanimous voice of both Houses of Congress, the work was commenced for the redemption and cancellation of these notes. The great revenues of the nation were applied to this purpose and to the reduction of the interest-bearing debt.

Hardly had the great cost of the war been stated when the nation was menaced with the formidable threat of repudiation. The worst elements of American politics were appealed to, and the passions of selfishness and cupidity were summoned to the aid of those who joined in the assault on the public faith.

The autumn of 1867 and the spring of 1868 were days of darkness and gloom; but during the summer and fall of 1868 the republican party appealed with confidence to the American conscience to put down repudiation in every form, to keep the public faith, and pay the sacred obligations of the war to the uttermost farthing.

No issue was ever more sharply defined than that on which the presidential canvass of 1868 was made. That issue was declared in the national platform of the republican party, and the victorious results were announced in the first message of Grant, wherein he stated that—

> To protect the national honor every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Let it be understood that no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public places, and it will go far toward strengthening a credit which ought to be the best in the world.

This victory was sealed by the first act of Congress to which President Grant gave the approval of his signature, and which has been so often quoted in this debate. It was a victory won in the name of the public conscience, the public honor, the public faith—in the name of truth. From that moment the public credit was enhanced, month by month, and the national faith met no shock until the great struggle of 1870, when a most formidable attempt was made to break down the barriers of public confidence and launch the nation again upon a career of irredeemable paper-money expansion.

I believe no argument has been advanced during this debate that was not presented in the debate of 1870. I have now in my possession nearly fifty bills introduced into the two Houses of Congress in that year on this question, in which every shade of opinion now entertained in this House was expressed and advocated; bills to abolish the national-bank system and issue greenbacks in place of national-bank notes; and bills to authorize the reissue of the forty-four millions of greenbacks already retired and canceled. No one then ventured the opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury had power to reissue those notes without further authority from Congress.

The result of that debate was that the banking facilities of the South and West were increased, and additional notes were issued to the extent of fifty-four millions; but to prevent the inflation of the currency and the derangement or values it was provided that the 3 per cent. certificates, which were used as bank reserves and clearing-house certificates, should be retired and canceled pari passu with the increase of national-bank notes.

Those who favored a great enlargement of the currency at that time denounced the measure as wholly insufficient to meet the wants of the country. The fifty-four millions were said to be wholly inadequate to the demands of business. We were told that that amount would be taken up so soon as speedily to demonstrate its insufficiency. But, sir, the most significant possible answer to that opinion was the fact that the fifty-four millions were issued so slowly that even to-day four and one-third millions of that amount have not been taken by the national banks in the States that had less than their proportion of circulation. Let gentlemen explain this significant fact before they ask us to follow their lead.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in a time of profound peace, eight years after the last hostile gun was fired, we are called upon to reverse all this policy of the past; to break down the dikes and let the sea roll in upon us. We are asked to declare that it was a mistake to take any steps toward the resumption of specie payments; that it was a mistake to redeem our solemn promises to pay; that it was a mistake even to keep our faces turned toward the solid ground of stable values.

How many years of disastrous experience are needed to enforce the lesson that there are immutable laws of nature which no Congress can safely ignore and which no legislation can overturn? Underlying all exchange, all trade, all active industry, there are three elements which cannot be ignored, elements that enter into every contract and are of the essence of every exchange; elements that are recognized in the national Constitution.

They are the measure of extension, whether of length, breadth, depth, or capacity; the measure of weight, which is intimately related to that of extension; and the measuro of value, which is closely related to both. The Constitution empowers Congress to fix the standards of weights, of measures, and of value. But Congress cannot create extension, nor weight, nor value. It can measure what exists, it can declare and subdivide and name a standard; but it cannot make length of that which has no length, it cannot make weight of that which has no weight, it cannot make value of that which has no value.

With what care has our Government protected its standards! The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] sneeringly asked, why does not some one argue in favor of redeeming the yard-stick, the quart-pot, or the Fairbanks scales? In that paragraph he uses words without significance. We do not redeem these standards, but we do in regard to them what is analogous to the redemption of our standard of value. Our yard-stick is a metallic bar copied from the standard yard of England, which is nearly three hundred years old. It is deposited in the office of the Coast Survey and is sacredly guarded from diminution or injury. The best efforts of science have been brought to bear to make the yard-stick as little liable as possible to mutilation or change.

Two methods have been adopted by science to test the accuracy of the standard and preserve it from loss. One is to find a pendulum which swung in vacuo will make one vibration a second at a given altitude from the level of the sea; the other was a method adopted by France, when in the last century she sent her surveyors to measure six hundred miles of a meridian line, from Dunkirk to Barcelona. Thus she made her meter a given aliquot part of the earth's circumference, so that should her standard be lost the measure of the globe itself would furnish the means of restoring it. Both these standards are deposited in the Coast Survey, and together with the standard measures of capacity are furnished to the several States as the standards to which all our State and municipal laws refer. Every contract for the sale and delivery of anything that can be weighed or measured is based upon these standards, and the citizen who changes the weight or the measurement commits a misdemeanor for which he is punished by the law. The false weight and balance are still an abomination.

Sir, we do not redeem our yard-stick, but we preserve it, and by the solemn sanctions of the law demand that it shall be applied to all transactions where extension is an element. Let us with equal care restore and preserve our standard of value, which must be applied to every exchange of property between man and man. An uncertain and fluctuating standard is an evil whose magnitude is too vast for measurement. Let me call attention to a few features of the bill now before the House. Its first section abolishes all the reserves by which our statesmen have hitherto protected the circulation of banks and kept them in readiness to redeem their notes. This great safeguard is to be thrown away. The ballast is to be tossed from the boat of the balloon, the cables are to be cut which held it to the earth. But the section will operate unequally and unjustly. For example, it requires five and a half millions less of reserve to be held by the banks of New York, and five and a half millions more by the banks of Boston, than is now required by law. Inflation in New York—contraction in Boston.

Section 5 works a revolution in the system of bank balances. It requires 5 per cent. of the circulation of every national bank to be kept in New York and Washington. This takes twenty millions of greenbacks away from the sixteen redemption cities of the United States and places it in Washington and New York, for the purpose of making the officers of the Treasury assort and redeem the mutilated currency of the banks and issue new notes in their place.

By the third section forty-four millions are added to the greenback circulation. By this we are to lose all we have gained in the way of redeeming the promise of the nation to pay its long overdue paper. This is a permanent postponement of specie payments; it hopelessly cripples the machinery by which that result is to be reached. To this is added an unlimited increase of national-bank notes.

By this measure we invite two dangers. With one hand we throw overboard the ballast; with the other we spread the sails, and thus commit the ship of our public credit > ——To the god of storms,

> The lightning and the gale.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition before us is fraught with measureless mischief. If you will authorize free banking coupled with some wise restriction, something that will lead us slowly but surely toward specie payments; if we can reach the two great results, specie payments and free banking, we shall preserve the quality of our currency and shall leave its quantity to be regulated by the demands of trade. There never did exist on this earth a body of men wise enough to determine by any arbitrary rule how much currency is needed for the business of a great country. The laws of trade, the laws of credit, the laws of God impressed upon the elements of this world, are superior to all legislation; and we can enjoy the benefits of these immutable laws only by obeying them.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, that all the real wants of the great West and of the whole country shall be fully supplied; but let them be supplied by that which is reality, and not by broken and dishonored promises. Let us not offer to people of this country the apples of Sodom that shall turn to ashes on their lips.

I believe, sir, that if this legislation prevails the day is not far distant when the cry will come up from those who labor in humblest fields of industry, denouncing those who have let loose upon them the evils enveloped in this bill. It has been demonstrated again and again that upon the artisans, the farmers, the day-laborers falls at last the dead weight of all the depreciation and loss that irredeemable paper money carries in its train. Let this policy be carried out, and the day will surely and speedily come when the nation will clearly trace the cause of its disaster to those who deluded themselves and the people with what Jefferson fitly called "legerdemain tricks of paper money."

I was greatly surprised to hear gentlemen quote the fathers of the Republic as supporters of irredeemable paper money. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has referred to Franklin to support his opinions. I appeal from the Franklin of 1729 and 1764 to the Franklin of riper experience.

I have been, if not a thorough, yet a reverent reader of those great men whose names illuminate the pages of our history, and I affirm that they are almost unanimous in their condemnation of any standard of value except that of the Constitution, or any kind of paper money except such as is redeemable in gold at the will of the holder.

From the days of Washington to the present hour no President, no Secretary of the Treasury, and scarcely a statesman whose name is enrolled among the illustrious dead, has failed to make his protest against the weak and wicked policy of issuing and permanently maintaining an irredeemable paper currency. I should be false to history, false to the past of our nation, if I did not refer to this instructive fact.

I ask leave to put on record a few paragraphs on this subject from some of the great men who have adorned the records of our country. All are Americans save one. I quote one paragraph from an illustrious author, which exhibits the truth so well attested by the Americans whose testimony follows.

MILL.

Although no doctrine in political economy rests upon more obvious grounds than the mischief of a paper curreney not maintained at the same value with a metallic, either by convertibility or some principle of limitation equivalent to it; and although, accordingly, this doctrine has, though not till after the discussions of many years, been tolerably effectually drummed into the public mind; yet dissentients are still numerous, and projectors every now and then start up with plans for curing all the economical evils of society by means of an unlimited issue of inconvertible paper. There is, in truth, a great charm in the idea. To be able to pay off the national debt, defray the expenses of Government without taxation, and, in fine, to make the fortunes of the whole community, is a brilliant prospect, when once a man is capable of believing that printing a few characters on bits of paper will do it. The philosopher's stone could not be expected to do more.—Mill's Political Economy, volume 2, book 3, chapter 13, section 3.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

It is true that Franklin, in a juvenile essay written in 1729 at the age of twenty-two, warmly advocated the paper-money delusion which was generally in vogue at that period. And he also in 1764 wrote a reply to the British Board of Trade in which the same views appear. But paper money had not yet borne its bitterest fruit. But we may well appeal from his doctrines in 1729 and 1764 to the maturer counsels of 1779, when he wrote to James Lovell as follows:

I am glad to understand that you are taking measures to restore the value of your money by taxing largely to reduce the quantity. I believe no financier in the world can put you upon a more effective method.—Franklin's Works, volume 8, page 368, lines 14-17.

And in a still later letter, addressed to Josiah Quincy, under date of Passey, September 11, 1783, he gave this emphatic testimony:

I lament with you the many mischiefs, the injustice, the corruption of manners, &c., that attended a depreciating currency. It is some consolation to me that I washed my hands of that evil by predicting it in Congress, and proposing means that would have been effectual to prevent it if they had been adopted. Subsequent operations that I have executed demonstrate that my plan was practicable; but it was unfortunately rejected.—Franklin's Works, volume 10, page 9, paragraph 2.

LEE.

Richard Henry Lee, President of Congress, addressed a letter to

George Washington on the 19th of November, 1785, in which occurs the following paragraph:

Is it possible that a plan can be formed for issuing a large sum of paper money by the next Assembly? I do verily believe that the greatest foes we have in the world could not devise a more effectual plan for ruining Virginia. I should suppose that every friend to his country, every honest and sober man, would join heartily to reprobate so nefarious a plan of speculation.

WASHINGTON.

To it Washington replied:

I have never heard, and I hope never shall hear, any serious mention of a paper emission in this State; yet such a thing may be in agitation. Ignorance and design are productive of much mischief. The former is the tool of the latter, and is often set to work suddenly and unexpectedly. Those with whom I have conversed on the subject in this part of the State, reprobate the idea exceedingly. (Spark's edition Washington's Writings, volume 9, page 120.)

In writing to Thomas Jefferson from Mount Vernon, under date of August 1, 1786, Washington says:

Some other States are, in my opinion, falling into the very foolish and wicked plans of emitting paper money. I cannot, however, give up my hopes and expectations, that we shall ere long adopt a more just and liberal system of policy.

In the course of the same letter he refers to the death of General McDougall, and says:

He belonged to the Legislature of his State. The last act of his life was (after being carried on purpose to the Senate) to give his voice against the emission of a paper currency. (Volume 9, page 186.)

In a letter dated Mount Vernon, February 16, 1787, addressed to Thomas Stone, a member of the Maryland senate, who had written to Washington that the house of representatives of that State had passed an act to authorize the issue of bills of credit to the amount of £350,000 at 6 per cent. interest, payable annually, and the principal redeemable in ten years, Washington says:

I do not scruple to declare that if I had a voice in your Legislature it would have been given decidedly against a paper emission upon the general principles of its utility as a representative, and the necessity of it as a medium.

To assign reasons for this opinion would be as unnecessary as tedious. The ground has been so often trod that a place hardly remains untouched. In a word, the necessity arising from a want of specie is represented as greater than it really is. I contend that it is by the substance, not with the shadow of a thing, we are to be benefited. The wisdom of man, in my humble opinion, cannot at this time devise a plan by which the credit of paper money would be long supported; consequently depreciation keeps pace with the quantity of the emission, and articles for which it is exchanged rise in a greater ratio than the sinking value of the money. Wherein, then, is the farmer, the planter, the artisan benefited? The debtor may be, because, as I have observed, he gives the shadow in lieu of the substance; and in proportion to his gain, the creditor of the body-politic suffers. Whether it be a legal tender or not, it will, as has been observed very truly, leave no alternative. It must be that or nothing. An evil equally great is the door it immediately opens for speculation, by which the least designing, and perhaps most valuable, part of the community are preyed upon by the more knowing and crafty speculators.

But, contrary to my intention and declaration, I am offering reasons in support of my opinion; reasons, too, which of all others are least pleasing to the advocate for paper money. I shall therefore only observe generally, that so many people have suffered by former emissions, that like a burnt child who dreads the fire, no person will touch it who can possibly avoid it. The natural consequence of which will be, that the specie which remains unexported will be instantly locked up. (Volume 9, page 231.)

JOHN ADAMS.

I cannot but lament from my inmost soul that lust for paper money which appears in some parts of the United States. There will never be any uniform rule, if there is any sense of justice, nor any clear credit, public or private, nor any settled confidence in public men or measures, until paper money is done away—John Adams, 1786.

PELETIAH WEBSTER.

Peletiah Webster, a merchant of Philadelphia, and an uncle of Noah Webster, the lexicographer, published a series of articles on the currency, which were collected in a volume in 1790. In 1781 he had published an able pamphlet, urging a convention for enlarging the Constitution. In one of his papers, written in 1780, on the effect of paper money, he says:

We have suffered more from this cause than from every other cause of calamity; it has killed more men, pervaded and corrupted the choicest interests of our country more, and done more injustice than even the arms and artifices of our enemies. * * * If it saved the State, it has also polluted the equity of our laws; turned them into engines of oppression and wrong; corrupted the justice of our public administration; destroyed the fortunes of thousands of those who had the most confidence in it; enervated the trade, husbandry, and manufactures of our country, and gone far to destroy the morality of our people.—Gouge, History of Paper Money, pages 30, 31.

After quoting this paragraph Mr. Gouge says, writing in 1833, on page 31:

Many who are yet living can attest the truth of the statement.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

The history of the convention that framed the national Constitution is full of significance in its relation to paper money. There can be no doubt that the founders believed they had drafted an instrument that made the evils of paper money impossible. After expressly prohibiting the States from emitting bills of credit, they proceeded to strike out from the first draught of the Constitution a clause which gave that power to Congress. I quote from the Madison Papers:

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS moved to strike out "and emit bills on the credit of the United States." If the United States had credit, such bills would be unnecessary; if they had not, unjust and useless.

Mr. BUTLER seconds the motion.

Mr. MADISON. Will it not be sufficient to prohibit the making them a tender? This will remove the temptation to emit them with unjust views, and promissory notes in that shape may in some emergencies be best.

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. Striking out the words will leave room still for notes of a responsible minister, which will do all the good without the mischief. The moneyed interest will oppose the plan of government, if paper emissions be not prohibited.

Mr. GORHAM was for striking out without inserting any prohibition. If the words stand they may suggest and lead to the measure.

Mr. MASON had doubts on the subject. Congress, he thought, would not have the power unless it were expressed. Though he had a mortal hatred to paper money, yet, as he could not foresee all emergencies, he was unwilling to tie the hands of the Legislature. He observed that the late war could not have been carried on had such a prohibition existed.

Mr. GORHAM. The power, as far as it will be necessary or safe, is involved in that of borrowing.

Mr. MERCER was a friend to paper money, though in the present state and temper of America he should neither propose nor approve of such a measure. He was consequently opposed to a prohibition of it altogether. It will stamp suspicion on the Government to deny it a discretion on this point. It was impolitic also to excite the opposition of all those who were friends to paper money. The people of property would be sure to be on the side of the plan, and it was impolitic to purchase their further attachment with the loss of the opposite class of citizens.

Mr. ELLSWORTH thought this a favorable moment to shut and bar the door against paper money. The mischiefs of the various experiments which had been made were now fresh in the public mind, and had excited the disgust of all the respectable part of America. By withholding the power from the new Government, more friends of influence would be gained to it than by almost anything else. Paper money can in no case be necessary. Give the Government credit and other resources will offer. The power may do harm, never good.

Mr. RANDOLPH, notwithstanding his antipathy to paper money, could not agree to strike out the words, as he could not foresee all the occasions that might arise.

Mr. WILSON. It will have a most salutary influence on the credit of the United States, to remove the possibility of paper money. This expedient can never succeed while its mischiefs are remembered; and, as long as it can be resorted to, it will be a bar to other resources.

Mr. BUTLER remarked, that paper was a legal tender in no country in Europe. He was urgent for disarming the Government of such a power.

Mr. MASON was still averse to tying the hands of the Legislature altogether. If there was no example in Europe, as just remarked, it might be observed, on the other side, that there was none in which the Government was restrained on this head.

Mr. READ thought the words, if not struck out, would be as alarming as the mark of the beast in Revelation.

Mr. LANGDON had rather reject the whole plan than retain the three words "and emit bills."

On the motion for striking out—

New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina,* South Carolina, Georgia, ay—9; New Jersey, Maryland, no—2.

To this vote is appended the following note by Mr. Madison:

* This vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper; and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender, either for public or private debts.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report what may be necessary for the establishment of the public credit, Hamilton made his report to the House on the national bank, December 13, 1790, in which he said:

The emitting of paper money by the authority of the Government is wisely prohibited to the individual States by the national Constitution; and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the Government of the United States. Though paper emissions, under a general authority, might have some advantages not applicable and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable to the like emissions by the States separately, yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse—and it may even be affirmed, so certain of being abused—that the wisdom of the Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an expedient. In times of tranquillity it might have no ill consequence; it might even perhaps be managed in a way to be productive of good; but in great and trying emergencies there is almost a moral certainty of its becoming mischievous. The stamping of paper is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes that a Government in the practice of paper emissions would rarely fail in any such emergency to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity. If it should not even be carried so far as to be rendered an absolute bubble, it would at least be likely to be extended to a degree which would occasion an inflated and artificial state of things incompatible with the regular and prosperous course of the political economy.

Among other material differences between a paper currency issued by the mere authority of Government, and one issued by a bank payable in coin, is this: That, in the first case, there is no standard to which an appeal can be made as to the quantity which will only satisfy or which will surcharge the circulation. In the last that standard results from the demand. If more should be issued than is necessary it will return upon the bank. Its emissions, as elsewhere intimated, must always be in a compound ratio to the fund and the demand, whence it is evident that there is a limitation in the nature of the thing, while the discretion of the Government is the only measure of the extent of the emissions by its own authority.—Works of Alexander Hamilton, volume 3, page 125.

JEFFERSON.

Few of the revolutionary fathers made a more careful study and enjoyed a wider range of experience on questions of political economy, than Thomas Jefferson. His writings abound in striking passages, setting forth the evils of paper money.

Writing from Monticello, June 24, 1813, to John W. Eppes, he says:

Every one knows that although not literally it is nearly true that every paper dollar emitted banishes a silver one from the circulation. A nation, therefore, making its purchases and payments with bills fitted for circulation, thrusts an equal sum of coin out of circulation.

In this letter he complains that the States "have unfortunately fooled away, nay corruptly alienated to swindlers and shavers, under the cover of private banks, the power of issuing bills in time of war." He holds that Congress ought to take control of this subject and not allow it to the States. Toward the close of the letter he says that we have unfortunately copied from Great Britain the idea of giving paper in exchange for discounted bills, and says (page 142) of Great Britain:

The unlimited emission of bank paper has banished all her specie, and is now, by a depreciation acknowledged by her own statesmen, carrying her rapidly to bankruptcy as it did France; as it did us, and will do us again, and every country permitting paper to be circulated other than that by public authority, rigorously limited to the just measure for circulation. Private fortunes in the present state of our circulation are at the mercy of those self-created money-lenders, and are prostrated by the floods of nominal money with which their avarice deluges us.—Jefferson's Works, volume 6, page 139.

In another letter to John W. Eppes, dated Monticello, November 6, 1813, he says:

It is a litigated question whether the circulation of paper, rather than of specie, is a good or an evil. In the opinion of England and of English writers it is a good; in that of all other nations it is an evil; and excepting England and her copyist, the United States, there is not a nation existing, I believe, which tolerates a paper circulation. The experiment is going on, however, desperately in England, pretty boldly with us, and at the end of the chapter we shall see which opinion experience approves; for I believe it to be one of those cases where mercantile clamor will bear down reason until it is corrected by ruin. * * * * * *

The adequate price of a thing depends on the capital and labor necessary to produce it. * * * Two things requiring the same capital and labor should be of the same price. * * * The comparative prices of things being thus to be estimated and expressed by a common measure, we may proceed to observe that where a country so insulated as to have no commercial intercourse with any other, to confine the interchange of all its wants and supplies within itself, the amount of circulating medium as a common measure for adjusting these exchanges, would be quite immaterial. If their circulation, for instance, were of a million of dollars, and the annual produce of their industry equivalent to ten millions of bushels of wheat, the price of a bushel of wheat might be one dollar. If then, by a progressive coinage, their medium should be doubled the price of a bushel of wheat might become progressively two dollars, and without inconvenience. * * * But where a nation is in a full course of interchange of wants and supplies with all others, the proportion of its medium to its produce is no longer indifferent. To trade on equal terms, the common measure of values should be as nearly as possible on a par with that of its corresponding nations, whose medium is in a sound state; that is to say, not in an accidental state of excess or deficiency. Now one of the great advantages of specie as a medium is, that being of universal value, it will keep itself at a general level, flowing out from where it is too high into parts where it is lower. Whereas, if the medium be of local value only, as paper money, if too little, indeed, gold and silver will flow in to supply the deficiency; but if too much, it accumulates, banishes the gold and silver not locked up in vaults, and hoards and depreciates itself, that is to say, its proportion to the annual produce of industry being raised, more of it is required to represent any particular article of produce than in the other countries. (Volume 6, page 232.)

And again, (ibid., page 241:)

The truth is, that capital may be produced by industry, and accumulated by economy; but jugglers only will propose to create it by legerdemain tricks with paper.

He then discussed the proposition pending at that time in Congress for more circulation, and says:

The overbearing clamor of merchants, speculators, and projectors will drive us before them, with our eyes open, until as in France, under the Mississippi bubble, our citizens will be overtaken by the crush of this baseless fabric, without other satisfaction than that of execrations on the heads of those functionaries, who, from ignorance, pusillanimity, or corruption have betrayed the fruits of their industry into the hands of projectors and swindlers.

He then argues the necessity of bringing our money to specie values, and says:

That specie is the most perfect medium because it will preserve its own level, because, having intrinsic and universal value, it can never die in our hands, and it is the surest resource of reliance in time of war; that the trifling economy of paper as a cheaper medium, or its convenience for transmission, weighs nothing in opposition to the advantages of the precious metals; that it is liable to be abused, has been, is, and forever will be, abused in every country in which it is permitted; that it is already at a term of abuse in these States which has never been reached by any other nation, France excepted, whose dreadful catastrophe should be a warning against the instrument which produced it; that we are already at ten or twenty times the due quantity of medium, insomuch that no man knows what his property is now worth, because it is bloating while he is calculating, and still less what it will be worth when the medium shall be relieved from its present dropsical state; and that it is a palpable falsehood to say we can have specie for our paper whenever demanded.

Instead, then, of yielding to the cries of scarcity of medium set up by speculators, projectors, and commercial gamblers, no endeavors should be spared to begin the work of reducing it by such gradual means as may give time to private fortunes to preserve their poise and settle down with the subsiding medium; and that for this purpose the States should be urged to concede to the General Government, with a saving of chartered rights, the exclusive power of establishing banks of discount for paper.

MADISON.

In a letter to Jefferson dated August 12, 1786, Mr. Madison, says:

These fruits of the Revolution do great honor to it. I wish all our proceedings merited the same character. Unhappily there are but too many belonging to the opposite side of the account. At the head of these is to be put the general rage for paper money. Pennsylvania and North Carolina took the lead in this folly. In the former the sum emitted was not considerable, the funds for sinking it were good, and it was not made a legal-tender. It issued into circulation partly by way of loan to individuals on landed security, partly by way of payment to the public creditors. Its present depreciation is about 10 or 12 per cent. In North Carolina the sums issued at different times have been of greater amount, and it has constantly been a tender. It issued partly in payments to military creditors, and latterly, in purchases of tobacco on public account. The agent, I am informed, was authorized to give nearly the double of the current price; and as the paper was a tender, debtors ran to him with their tobacco, and the creditors paid the expense of the farce. The depreciation is said to be 25 or 30 per cent. in that State. South Carolina was the next in order. Her emission was in the way of loans to individuals and is not a legal-tender. But land is there made a tender in case of suits, which shuts the courts of justice, and is, perhaps, as great an evil. The friends of the emission say that it has not yet depreciated, but they admit that the price of commodities has risen, which is evidently the form in which depreciation will first show itself.

New Jersey has just issued £30,000 (dollar at 7*s.* 6*d.*) in loan to her citizens. It is a legal tender. An addition of £100,000 is shortly to follow on the same principles. The terror of popular associations stifles, as yet, an overt discrimination between it and specie; but as this does not operate in Philadelphia and New York, where all the trade of New Jersey is carried on, its depreciation has already commenced in those places, and must soon communicate itself to New Jersey. New York is striking £200,000 (dollar at 8*s.*) on the plan of loans to her citizens. It is made a legal tender in case of suits only. As it is but just issuing from the press, its depreciation exists only in the foresight of those who reason without prejudice on the subject. In Rhode Island, £100,000 (dollar at 6*s.*) has lately been issued in loans to individuals. It is not only made a tender, but severe penalties annexed to the least attempt, direct or indirect, to give a preference to specie. Precautions dictated by distrust in the rulers soon produced it in the people. Supplies were withheld from the market, the shops were shut, popular meetings ensued and the State remains in a sort of convulsion.

The Legislature of Massachusetts, at their last session, rejected a paper emission by a large majority. Connecticut and New Hampshire also have as yet forborne, but symptoms of danger, it is said, begin to appear in the latter. The senate of Maryland has hitherto been a bar to paper in that State. The clamor for it is now universal, and as the periodical election of the senate happens at this crisis, and the whole body is unluckily by their constitution to be chosen at once, it is probable that a paper emission will be the result. If, in spite of the zeal exerted against the old senate, a majority of them should be re-elected, it will require all their firmness to withstand the popular torrent. Of the affairs of Georgia I know as little as of those of Kamtchatka.

Whether Virginia is to remain exempt from the epidemic malady will depend on the ensuing Assembly. My hopes rest chiefly on the exertions of Colonel Mason, and the failure of the experiments elsewhere. That these must fail is morally certain; for besides the proofs of it already visible in some States, and the intrinsic defect of the paper in all, this fictitious money will rather feed than cure the spirit of extravagance which sends away the coin to pay the unfavorable balance, and will therefore soon be carried to market to buy up coin for that purpose. From that moment depreciation is inevitable. The value of money consists in the uses it will serve. Specie will serve all the uses of paper; paper will not serve one of the essential uses of specie.—Madison's Works, volume 1, page 243.

In a letter to C. D. Williams, of February, 1820, he says:

It cannot be doubted that a paper currency, rigidly limited in its quantity to purposes absolutely necessary, may be made equal and even superior in value to specie. But experience does not favor a reliance on such experiment. Whenever the paper has not been convertible into specie, and its quantity has depended on the policy of the Government, a depreciation has been produced by an undue increase, or an appreciation of it.—Madison's Works, volume 3, page 166.

WEBSTER.

In 1816 Daniel Webster said in this House:

Wars and invasions are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They announce their own approach, and the general security is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper-money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easy payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation.

In 1833 Mr. Webster said in the Senate:

We are in danger of being overwhelmed with irredeemable paper, mere paper, representing not gold nor silver; no, sir, representing nothing but broken promises, bad faith, bankrupt corporations, cheated creditors, and a ruined people.

And again, in 1836, he said:

If we wish to restore the public credit and to re-establish the finances, we have the beaten road before us. All true analogy, all experience, and all just knowledge of ourselves and our condition, point one way. A wise and systematic economy, and a settled and substantial revenue, are the means to be relied on; not excessive issues of bank-notes, a forced circulation, and all the miserable contrivances to which political folly can resort, with the idle expectation of giving to mere paper the quality of money. These are the inventions of a short-sighted policy, vexed and goaded by the necessities of the moment, and thinking less of a permanent remedy than of shifts and expedients to avoid the present distress. They have been a thousand times adopted, and a thousand times exploded as delusive and ruinous, as destructive of all solid revenue, and incompatible with the security of private property.

GOUGE, 1833.

Speaking of the system of bank paper as a circulating medium, Mr. W. M. Gouge, who published his able work entitled a Short History of Paper Money and Banking in the United States in 1833, says:

As in the case of all public evils, the system bears with the most hardship on the poor. The rate of wages is, as we have seen, the last thing that is affected by an expansion; and one necessary consequence of a contraction is to deprive some men of employment. If a rich man cannot sell his merchandise to-day, he can sell it to-morrow; and if he cannot sell it for full price, he can sell it for half price. But labor is the poor man's only commodity. If he cannot sell it to-day, it is lost to him forever.

The substantial capitalist is a frequent loser, though sometimes a gainer, by these fluctuations. If his capital is small, and his credit in proportion, it is with difficulty he escapes from total ruin in times of contraction.

The reckless speculator who has no capital of his own, but who operates extensively on the capital of other people, has much cause to be well pleased with this system. If a loss is sustained by a fall of prices the loss falls on his creditors, for he has nothing to lose. If there is a gain through a rise of prices, the gain is all his own.

CALHOUN, 1837.

The currency of a country is to the community what the blood is to the human system. It constitutes a small part, but it circulates through every portion, and is indispensable to all the functions of life. The currency bears even a smaller proportion to the aggregate capital of the community than what the blood does to the solids in the human system. What that portion is has not been, and perhaps cannot be, accurately ascertained, as it is probably subject to considerable variations. It is probably between twenty-five and thirty-five to one. I will assume it to be thirty to one. With this assumption, let us suppose a community whose aggregate capital is $31,000,000, its currency would be, by supposition, one million, and the residue of its capital thirty millions. This being assumed, if the currency be increased or decreased, the other portion of the capital remains the same, according to the well-known laws of currency; property would rise or fall with increase or decrease; that is, if the currency be increased to two millions, the aggregate value of property would rise to sixty millions; and if the currency be reduced to $500,000, it would be reduced to fifteen millions. With this law so well established, place the money-power in the hands of a single individual, or a combination of individuals, and, by expanding or contracting the currency they may raise or sink prices at pleasure; and by purchasing when at the greatest depression, and selling at the greatest elevation, may command the whole property and industry of the community and control its fiscal operations. The banking system concentrates and places this power in the hands of those who control it, and its force increases just in proportion as it dispenses with a metallic basis. Never was an engine invented better calculated to place the destiny of the many in the hands of the few, or less favorable to that equality and independence which lie at the bottom of all free institutions.—Calhoun; Debates in Congress, volume 14, part 1, 1837, page 476.

CALHOUN, MARCH 22, 1838.

I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered—what heretofore I have but suggested—that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive it, in all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold and silver at their option, would, to the extent that it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation which could not be abused by the Government, that it would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves.

BUCHANAN, 1837.

The evils of a redundant paper circulation are now manifest to every eye. It alternately raises and sinks the value of every man's property. It makes a beggar of the man to-morrow who is indulging in dreams of wealth to-day. It converts the business of society into a mere lottery; while those who distribute the prizes are wholly irresponsible to the people. When the collapse comes, as come it must, it casts laborers out of employment, crushes manufacturers and merchants, and ruins thousands of honest and industrious citizens.—Buchanan; Debates in Congress, volume 14, part 1, 1837, page 355.

S. P. CHASE.

Mr. Chase, in his annual report of December 9, 1861, discusses two financial plans; one for issuing greenbacks as currency, the other for establishing national banks. After stating the advantages of the first, he says:

These advantages are, doubtless, considerable; and if a scheme can be devised by which such a circulation will be certainly and strictly confined to the real needs of the people and kept constantly equivalent to specie by prompt and certain redemption in coin, it will hardly fail of legislative sanction.

The plan, however, is not without serious inconveniences and hazards. The temptation, especially great in time of pressure and danger, to issue notes without adequate provision for redemption; the ever-present liability to be called on for redemption beyond means, however carefully provided and managed; the hazard of panics, precipitating demands for coin, concentrated on a few points and a single fund; the risk of a depreciated, depreciating, and finally worthless paper money; the immeasurable evils of dishonored public faith and national bankruptcy; all these are possible consequences of the adoption of a system of government circulation. It may be said, and perhaps truly, that they are less deplorable than those of an irredeemable bank circulation. Without entering into that comparison, the Secretary contents himself with observing that, in his judgment, these possible disasters so far outweigh the probable benefits of the plan that he feels himself constrained to forbear recommending its adoption.

In the Finance Report for 1862, page 16, Mr. Chase says:

A circulation composed exclusively of notes issued directly by the Government, or of such notes and coin, is recommended mainly by two considerations—the first derived from the facility with which it may be provided in emergencies, and the second from its cheapness.

The principal objections to such a circulation as a permanent system are, first, the facility of excessive expansion when expenditures exceed revenue; second, the danger of lavish and corrupt expenditure, stimulated by facility of expansion; third, the danger of fraud in management and supervision; fourth, the impossibility of providing it in sufficient amounts for the wants of the people whenever expenditures are reduced to equality with or below it.

* * * * * * *

If these reasonings be sound little room can remain for doubt that the evils certain to arise from such a scheme of currency, if adopted as a permanent system, greatly overbalance the temporary, though not inconsiderable, advantages offered by it.

It remains to be considered what results may be reasonably expected from an act authorizing the organization of banking associations, such as the Secretary proposed in his last report.

The central idea of the proposed measure is the establishment of one sound uniform circulation, of equal value throughout the country, upon the foundation of national credit combined with private capital.

Such a currency, it is believed, can be secured through banking associations organized under national legislation.

It is proposed that these associations be entirely voluntary. Any persons desirous of employing real capital, in sufficient amounts, can, if the plan be adopted, unite together under proper articles, and, having contributed the requisite capital, can invest such part of it, not less than a fixed minimum, in United States bonds, and having deposited these bonds with the proper officer of the United States, can receive United States notes in such denominations as may be desired, and employ them as money in discounts and exchanges.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. SMITH.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, if I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the prosperity of a people is not indicated by the nominal amount of the wages or wealth of each citizen, but by the real amount. It is the purchasing power of wages that gives wages their value. If a dollar will buy as many of the necessaries of life under one set of circumstances as two dollars will purchase under other circumstances, it is of equal value with the two dollars for every purpose except the payment of debts already contracted. Now, sir, we have had a great many definitions of money during the progress of this debate. I believe it is universally conceded that its office is that of a measurer of values and an instrument of exchange, and I think no one will deny that it is desirable that its value should be as nearly stable and as little liable to fluctuation as anything we can obtain can be. There is no article in this world of absolutely determined and fixed value. There is no article in this world, as compared with any different sort of article, of determined and fixed value. But the article that approaches more nearly the abstract idea of perfect excellence than any other, as a measurer of values, in the opinion of all men, in every age, is gold. It is an article of universal desire, and the amount in use changes from decade to decade very slowly. It is nearly indestructible; it is divisible; it is beautiful; and its fineness and purity can be ascertained with absolute exactness. It is honest; there is no fraud about it. For these reasons it has been selected and adopted by every nation in which commerce has flourished, either internal or external, as the article best calculated to measure the value of every other article. I am stating nothing new. I assume even the wildest inflationist in Congress will neither give me credit for a new discovery nor deny the truth of my statement.

Now, sir, what is paper money? It is a promise to pay gold. It is a promise to pay on demand, or at some future day, a given amount of gold. Without that promise what is it? Nothing. Worthless, utterly worthless. Its value depends wholly on faith in the promise. In proportion as you destroy faith in that promise, you depreciate the value of the promise. If all faith is destroyed the promise is of no value. But, on the other hand, if the promise is to pay gold on demand and that faith is kept, the promise to pay is held to be equal, or nearly equal, to the gold itself in value. But the moment it becomes apparent that the pledge to pay gold will not or cannot be kept, that moment the pledge itself loses a part or all of its value. The Government of the United States, a dozen years ago, issued a large amount of promises to pay money—that is, gold coin, and made those promises legal-tenders for the payment of debts. In the darkest hours of the war it solemnly pledged itself by act of Congress that the amount should never again be increased. Congress did that for the purpose of inspiring confidence in their ultimate payment. Again, sir, when the war was over Congress reduced the amount $44,000,000, and solemnly pledged the honor of the nation that at the earliest practicable day they should be redeemed in coin. Shall we take steps to violate our sacred promise? Shall we turn away from the fulfillment of our solemn obligation?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the path of honor is always the path of true policy. It is frequently hard to pay debts. I know what it is, sir. The wife and children may have to be deprived of many comforts. The home may be poorer. But that man who will not pay his honest debts, if in order to do so he has to live more poorly than his tastes or his supposed necessities may demand, deserves the contempt of all upright men and women. If this be true of a man, how much more of a State? The man dies in a few years and is forgotten. The State lives through the life of many generations. If honesty is the best policy for the individual, how much more is it the best policy for the State?

I read on this subject from Macaulay's Life of Clive:

That honesty is the best policy is a maxim which we firmly believe to be generally correct, even with respect to the temporal interest of individuals; but with respect to societies, the rule is subject to still fewer exceptions, and that for this reason: that the life of societies is longer than the life of individuals. It is possible to mention men who have owed great worldly prosperity to breaches of private faith; but we doubt whether it be possible to mention a State which has on the whole been a gainer by breach of public faith. The entire history of British India is an illustration of the great truth, that it is not prudent to oppose perfidy to perfidy, and that the most efficient weapon with which men can encounter falsehood is truth. During a long course of years the English rulers of India, surrounded by allies and enemies whom no engagement could bind, have generally acted with sincerity and uprightness; and the event has proved that sincerity and uprightness are wisdom. English valor and English intelligence have done less to extend and preserve our oriental empire than English veracity. All that we could have gained by imitating the doublings, the evasions, the fictions, the perjuries, which have been employed against us, is as nothing when compared with what we have gained by being the one power in India on whose word reliance can be placed. No oath which superstition can devise, no hostage, however precious, inspires a hundredth part of the confidence which is produced by the "yea, yea," and "nay, nay," of a British envoy. No fastness, however strong by art or nature, gives to its inmates a security like that enjoyed by the chief who, passing through the territories of powerful and deadly enemies, is armed with the British guarantee. The mightiest princes of the East can scarcely, by the offer of enormous usury, draw forth any portion of the wealth which is concealed under the hearths of their subjects. The British government offers little more than 4 per cent.; and avarice hastens to bring forth tens of millions of rupees from its most secret repositories. A hostile monarch may promise mountains of gold to our Sepoys, on condition that they will desert the standard of the company. The company promises only a moderate pension after a long service. But every Sepoy knows that the promise of the company will be kept; he knows that if he lives a hundred years his rice and salt are as secure as the salary of the governor-general; and he knows that there is not another state in India which would not, in spite of the most solemn vows, leave him to die of hunger in a ditch as soon as he had ceased to be useful.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want it distinctly understood that this question is not a question of section with me. It is the honor and glory of my country in which I am interested. It is for its fair fame, its veracity, its honesty, that I plead. I will not teach my children that the path from the fulfillment of a promise is the path that duty requires me or them to follow. Let it be to the advantage or disadvantage of those whom I represent, my path is marked out. It is the path of duty and the path of honor. It is in the direction of the performance of all our national obligations. Sir, I know that before we reach specie payments we have a hard and perhaps a long road to follow. I admit that it may not be well or wise to attempt at a single stride to reach the desired goal. But, sir, I would resolutely set forward; at each step the journey will grow shorter and the task easier.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that this question is in no sense a sectional one with me, so far as my action is guided. But, sir, I confess that the duty of voting as I shall becomes more agreeable in view of the fact that it happens to conform to the interests of my constituents. We hear a great deal said about protection to industry on this floor. Sir, I am in favor of protecting industry. But I have yet to learn why it is less incumbent on us to protect the industry of the millions who toil in the grain-fields of the West or the cotton-fields of the South than it is to protect the industry of those who labor in the manufactories of New England or the iron mines of Pennsylvania.

For many years we of the West and South have been taxed for the benefit of less favored portions of the country. We have sold our agricultural products at the prices which they would bring in the great markets of the world, less the cost of getting them there. But we have been compelled to pay not only the prices of those things we buy in the great markets of the world, but large additional sums in many cases to add to the profits of our own fellow-citizens. Prices, consequently, of all we have had to sell have for years been meager and low. Prices of everything we have had to buy have been extravagantly high. No wonder, sir, that trade is dull in New York and Boston. The secret is a plain one, if you would only see it. We of the West are your customers. We are too poor to buy your goods. We have been selling at low prices and buying at high prices, until we have no longer the means to take our usual supply. What are the consequences? Trade is dull in the great manufacturing and distributing centers; and, as a consequence of that, prices of manufactured goods are coming down. We of the West and South are at last able to purchase our iron and cotton cloth at a more reasonable rate than we have done for years. We have been selling our products low for years. Now let us try buying our goods low for a while.

I have taken the trouble to examine with some care the market reports at Cincinnati, the great central market of the continent, for some years past; and, on the whole, it has had the effect of convincing me that it is not for the interests of those I represent that the currency should be inflated. I have arranged in tabular form a statement of the prices of a number of the great articles of western production, as taken from the Cincinnati Gazette for the 6th of April, 1872, the 6th of April, 1873, and the 6th of April, 1874. I have also arranged in tabular form the prices of a number of manufactured articles which we largely purchase in the West, taken from the same paper for the same dates. I presume that other manufactured articles would bear about a proportionate price with those I have selected. The following is the table:

PRODUCTIONS.

Articles.	April 8, 1872.	April 6, 1873.	April 6, 1874.
Wheat	$1 69	$1 60	$1 33
Corn	47½	38	64
Oats	40	38	54
Barley	78	87	1 60
Mess pork	12 75	16 50	17 00
Live hogs	4 20	5 75	5 40
Cattle	4 75	5 00	5 25
Whisky	83	85	92

MANUFACTURES.

Pig-iron, charcoal	$50 00	$55 00	$38 00
Nails, eightpenny and ninepenny	6 00	5 25	4 25
Salt, Kenhawee	*36	33	28
Brown sheetings	13½	13½	10½
Bleached sheetings	22	21	18
Sugar, Demarara	11¼	11¼	†9¼
Coffee, Rio	.....	24	29

*Per bushel. †Refined.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if any one will examine the foregoing tables he will see that at this date each one of these eight great western products, except wheat, is worth largely more than it was two years ago. Corn is worth about 33 per cent. more; oats about 33 per cent. more; barley 100 per cent. more; mess pork 33 per cent. more; live hogs 25 per cent. more; cattle 10 per cent. more; whisky 10 per cent. more. Wheat is worth about 20 per cent. less.

Now, of such manufactured articles as I have been able to obtain prices of, iron is 30 per cent. cheaper than it was a year ago; nails about 25 per cent. cheaper than one year ago, and about 30 per cent. cheaper than two years ago, and I think about the same relation holds good of all grades of iron; salt is about 20 per cent. cheaper than two years ago; brown sheetings are more than 20 per cent. and bleached sheetings more than 20 per cent. cheaper than two years ago.

I have no doubt, sir, that if any one will take the trouble to verify the fact he will find that manufactured articles are at this date much cheaper than they have been on the 9th day of April for many years. It may be that there are articles that are exceptions; but it may be said generally, and with great certainty, that the products of the West will bring more money than the same amount of products would have brought for years past, and that the money we are getting for our products will buy more goods than for years past.

Now, what does inflation mean? What is the result that must surely follow. The prices of all the great products of the West are regulated by the prices which obtain for them in Europe; and in the very nature of things, as long as we have a surplus of any one of them to sell abroad, no amount of inflation can affect the price any further than it depreciates the value of the currency paid for the products. But not so, sir, with manufactured articles. Inflate the currency and every product of the shops of New England and of the mines of Pennsylvania goes up largely in price.

Mr. Speaker, I may stand alone from the West on this floor in advocacy of not only the honor of the Government but of the just and equitable pecuniary interests of the great bulk of the population of my section. I know not how that may be, sir. All my friends from Indiana, as well as the rest of the West, may make haste to make living more costly in every cabin on the prairies of the West; but I will not. The great bulk of the farm products of the West for the year 1873 was sold under all the depressing influences of the financial convulsion of the last fall. Our people have reaped their full share of the harvest of distress consequent on the panic. Many homes have been sorely stinted not only of the comforts but of the necessaries of life. It has been the first, but always inevitable, bitter experience of an irredeemable paper currency. I doubt not you may again by inflation of the currency stimulate into feverish excitement all the channels of speculation. But, sir, that is not prosperity. You may again crowd your hotels and railroad-cars with gaily dressed men and women; you may send stocks up like a balloon, and fill the streets of your cities with the equipages of fortunate speculators; you may enable reckless adventurers to unload property purchased on baseless credit on the innocent and the ignorant. But all this is not prosperity.

When this great national Legislature shall say to the people of this country, in words which cannot be mistaken, that impartial justice shall be done to every interest and every pursuit, that the public credit shall be inviolate, that the last cent of public indebtedness shall be sacredly paid, that the national currency shall be, slowly perhaps, but surely, brought to the specie standard, that no step in respect to that shall be taken backward; when every man in this broad land shall go to work with the absolute certainty that no meddling or tinkering of the currency shall interfere with any contract he makes or any business in which he engages; when you have pursued this policy long enough for it to be distinctly understood that it will be adhered to, all the industries of the land will be set in healthy and unceasing motion. Then, and not until then, will activity and intelligence, thrift and economy, join hands in creating a prosperity in this new country such as this world has not hitherto known.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to vote for a modification of our laws in relation to banks and currency. I would like to get rid, by some practicable provision, of the monopoly feature of our banking law. If that be not practicable, I think it but simple justice that the West and the South should have equal banking facilities, according to their population and needs, with the North and East. If a portion of the superabundant circulation furnished by the Government to the eastern banks should be gradually withdrawn and given to banking associations in the West and South as they may require it, it would allay a source of irritation, it would do justice between the different portions of the country, and practically it would be "free banking" in those portions of the country where free banking is, or seems to be, regarded as such a necessity. But, sir, mere inflation, a new provision of law to force the people of this country to accept and use as money in the prosecution of their business millions on millions more of money that is not money—of promises disregarded—without any provision looking even in the far-distant future to veracity, to solvency, to redemption—never, sir, never by my vote.

I beg of gentlemen to pay some heed to the moral aspect of this question. The air is foul with accusations of dishonesty, with charges of official and general corruption. I trust the half of what we hear is not true. If they are true, our whole social system must be rotten to the core. That, sir, I do not believe. Truth and honor, virtue and morality, are deeply planted in the American mind and conscience, and are the solid foundations of our national character. High personal character is the most priceless possession that any man can have. High national character is the richest heritage any people can possess. Nothing should be guarded so jealously. Wealth, reputation, seeming prosperity, fade into insignificance beside exalted character. Now, do gentlemen ever reflect on the lesson that our irredeemable paper promises to pay money is ceaselessly inculcating on the mind of every boy and man in all this land? Our legal-tender notes were issued during the dark days of the war. They were a war measure. The universal understanding was that they were a temporary measure. They were a forced loan to be paid back at the earliest practicable moment. Every one so understood them. Congress has with every circumstance of solemnity so declared. That great party which has so long and on the whole so wisely governed this country, that party which elected General Grant President and sent a large majority of us to this Hall, has everywhere, on every occasion, repeated the pledge. Now how is it? Nine years have passed since the war. Every stump orator has exhausted all the resources of rhetoric to demonstrate that there never was under the sunshine of heaven such marvelous and unprecedented material prosperity as that which we have experienced since the close of the war. But, sir, notwithstanding all that, and if that be true, there is no man to-day who has a one-dollar greenback in his pocket who does not carry about with him a violated promise of this great nation—an obligation disregarded. Are we not teaching the people that there is no dishonor in a violated promise, in an obligation unfulfilled?

Mr. Speaker, if I were in sore pecuniary distress, if my fortune and that of all my family were in extreme jeopardy for the lack of a sum of present money, and you were kind enough to lend me what I should need and should thereby save me from ruin, and I should give you my note to be paid as soon as I was able, that ability to be judged by myself, what would you think, what would any honorable man think, if after many years of wonderful prosperity, if after investing great sums in railroads, in manufacture of iron and cloth, and city property, I should still insist not only that I could not pay you, but should coolly ask you for a larger loan with an absolute refusal to give you any promise that I would ever at any time pay you what I owed you? Would you employ me to teach your children morality? How does that differ from the position this nation occupies to-day? Is public example less important as a teacher of virture than private example? May we not in this ignoble public violation of implied faith find a fruitful and potent source for much of the public corruption and private immorality which stains and darkens our country?

It is said that public sentiment demands these measures of inflation; that it demands that the day of the fulfillment of our sacred obligations should be indefinitely postponed; that no man from the West can ever return to the pleasant seats and agreeable company found in this Hall if he votes against these schemes. Well, if that be so, so be it. I have not been here long, but I have been here long enough to love my fellow-members very much, and I almost adore you, sir, since you were kind enough to give me the floor, and no doubt it would be very pleasant to come back again; but, sir, there are some things I prize far more than a seat in Congress: my own self-respect and the honor and fair fame of my country.

Pass this bill, sir, and you set out on a voyage over a stormy sea of financial uncertainty, without a rudder and without a compass. No man living can predict with any certainty whether we shall in the life-time of any one of us ever see a stable currency. The same causes which demand inflation now, will demand inflation again and again. Values will be as unstable as water. The shrewd and cunning will grow rich at the expense of the ignorant and the honest. The good will suffer, the bad will prosper.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will pause and not pass this bill. I think it is a false assumption that the people demand it at our hands. The evidence in favor of that assumption certainly is far from conclusive—so far as I have able to observe, it is not true. It ought not to be true. It would be a step toward shame and disgrace and disaster; a step difficult to retrace, and which will be long deplored.

Before Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, completed his remarks the hour of half-past three o'clock arrived, when

Mr. CREAMER called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] rose and was recognized as having charge of the bill, to close debate. But several members have called the attention of the Chair to the order under which the House was instructed to proceed to-day, and have desired to have it read. The Clerk will read the announcement which was made by the Speaker last evening on the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition again so that the House may understand what is objected to and what is not objected to. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that there shall be a session this evening, at half-past seven o'clock, which shall be devoted entirely to the discussion of the pending bill in fifteen-minute speeches, no vote to be taken thereon and no other business to be transacted, and that to-morrow, when the bill comes up under the order at half-past one o'clock, the discussion shall be continued, also in speeches of fifteen minutes, until half-past three, when he will ask the House to second the demand for the previous question. It will then be for the House to determine, of course, whether they will second that demand, and that will bring up the question whether the bill shall be open for amendments or substitutes. The gentleman having charge of the bill has a right to frame his own proposition and to ask the House to agree thereto. If there be no objection to that arrangement the Chair will consider it agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that just before the hour of half-past one to-day, as gentlemen will recollect, the yeas and nays were ordered on the then pending question, which accordingly ran over beyond that hour. I thought, therefore, that as a matter of fairness, if no objection was made to it, I might yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] beyond the hour of half-past three o'clock.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to the fact that he is himself to some extent responsible for this difficulty. He has had charge of this whole matter under an implied agreement on the part of the House that he would confine speeches to fifteen minutes, so that all of us who desire might have an opportunity of speaking. I waited very patiently three or four days for my turn to come, but I lost the opportunity through the indulgence which the gentleman from Tennessee extended to other gentlemen in allowing them to exceed the fifteen minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say that I have not attempted, as the Speaker will bear in mind, to control the floor. Gentlemen spoke, and the House was listening to them, and it was proposed that their time should be extended. No gentleman was heard to object, and I inferred—all of us would naturally infer—that gentlemen preferred hearing those distinguished speakers on this question to occupying the time themselves.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent that any gentlemen who have not had the privilege of speaking may be allowed to print their remarks in the RECORD. There are several gentlemen who desired to get the floor but could not do it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I ask leave to print the balance of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio was interrupted midway in his speech. Is there objection to allowing him to finish his remarks?

Mr. CREAMER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman being allowed to print the balance of his remarks.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask, as I commenced a sentence which I did not complete, in stating the value of greenbacks, that I may add to what I said so as to complete the sentence.

Mr. SPEER. I object to anything being added, unless consent is given to gentlemen to print their speeches. I shall insist on that objection unless the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] withdraws his objection to the printing of speeches.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to know if there is objection to my completing that sentence?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] objects.

Mr. SPEER. Unless the gentleman from California withdraws his objection to allowing those who have not been able to get the floor to print their remarks.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask that any gentleman who will file his speech to-day shall have the privilege of printing it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House, with a motion to recommit pending. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor, and will state upon what he desires the previous question to operate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the motion to recommit. I desire to say that there are three amendments, not affecting the principle of the bill, but perfecting the bill, that I will now offer, and if there be no objection, as I presume there will be none, for they are formal in their character, I will ask that they be adopted at this time. The first amendment is to come in at the close of section 2. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 2 the words:

And the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d day of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and section 21 of the original act to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire his amendments to be assented to now?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. I object, unless we have the sections read which are referred to in that amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will state in a word what the amendments are which I propose to offer.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to have the sections read.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate. The gentleman has no right to demand it. The gentleman from Tennessee is on the floor and has a right to have a vote on the amendment on his own presentation of it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I presume there will be no objection to this amendment, because if the bill is right this amendment is right, and if this amendment is wrong this whole bill is wrong. The act of March, 1865, altered section 21 of the act of 1864 by limiting the amount of notes that should be issued to the larger notes, and also apportioned the circulation allowed to the different States in accordance with their population and business. The object of this bill is to establish unrestricted, unlimited banking, and the amendment I propose is a provision that by inadvertence was left out in the draught of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3 in lines 10 and 11. The bill provides that the money sent for redemption shall be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York. The amendment that I am instructed to offer is to substitute the words "Treasurer of the United States," for "Secretary of the Treasury," and to strike out the word "the" before the words "assistant treasurer," and to substitute "any," and also to strike out the words "in the city of New York," and insert "of the United States;" so that it will read:

And when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, or to an assistant treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I also offer an amendment in the thirteenth line of the same section, to which my attention has been called by a gentleman within the last few moments. I move to strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury," and to insert in lieu thereof "Comptroller of the Currency;" so that it will read:

All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Comptroller of the Currency to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the gentleman leaves the third section I would like to ask him to consent that the first proviso, commencing at the end of the twenty-third line, be stricken out, and a substitute therefor adopted, which I have prepared, providing for the same object, only going more into detail in the manner of accomplishing it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will hear it read, and then decide whether I will admit it or not.

The portion of the bill proposed by Mr. RANDALL to be stricken out was as follows:

That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes.

The substitute therefor was a follows:

That hereafter the cost to the Government of engraving and reprinting of circulating notes to replace the worn, mutilated, and counterfeited circulating notes of national banking associations now organized, and of such as may be organized under the authority of this or any subsequent act, shall be paid for pro rata by all the national banking associations, respectively, in proportion as the said cost shall relatively bear to the circulation of each association; and, in case of default of any national banking association to reimburse the Government for the cost thereof by the payment of the amount which the Secretary of the Treasury may determine as the share of payment by such association, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to retain from time to time sufficient of the interest falling due on the bonds of such defaulting association on deposit in the United States Treasury to secure the circulation by law allowed to such association until the sum due has been realized and the same covered in the Treasury: And provided further, That the full cost of engraving and printing of all circulating notes which may be awarded to new associations organized under this act shall be reimbursed to the Government by such new association before such association shall be entitled to receive said notes; the cost to be determined in all instances heretofore stated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is in substance the provision of the bill as it now stands, but it endeavors to incorporate some Treasury regulations for which I do not see the necessity; and therefore I must decline to admit it. I now move to strike out the seventh section of the bill.

The section was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That associations without circulation may be organized under the provisions of the said act, upon the deposit, with the Treasurer of the United States, of not less than $10,000 of United States registered bonds, as provided in section 16 of said act; and associations already organized without circulation are authorized to withdraw their bonds in excess to $10,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to striking out that section.

Mr. KELLOGG. We should have some reason for striking it out.

Mr. MAYNARD. The committee thought upon further consideration that to provide for banks that had no circulation, with only $10,000 deposit, would tend to convert every broker's office in the country into a United States bank, and thus derogate from what they regarded as a proper provision of law.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think this is a good section; there is no expansion in it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask for a vote on the motion to strike out.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 126, noes 85.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Was it not agreed that the previous question should be called at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in charge of the bill has a right to submit amendments, but not to have any discussion thereon. And the rule if strictly insisted upon will confine the amendments to those which are strictly in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I insist upon the rule.

Mr. MAYNARD. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] has a substitute which he proposes to offer for the bill.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill, that which I send to the Clerk's desk. I will state that the first five sections of the substitute are the same as of the bill.

The substitute was as follows:

That section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and section 21 of the original act, to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment, be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted; and that section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained.

SEC. 2. That section 31 of the said act approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act approved June 30, 1864, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer, or to any assistant treasurer in the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Comptroller of the Currency to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum, in United States notes, equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed, under penalty of forfeiture of charter. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or, if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes in stead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

SEC. 4. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful money-reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful money-reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury, in payment, or deposit for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter-numbers of the associations by which they are severally issued.

SEC. 6. That any national bank desiring to withdraw a portion of its circulation may, upon deposit of United States notes in sums of not less than $9,000 with the Treasurer of the United States, withdraw bonds pledged to secure a like amount of its circulation; and the Treasurer shall redeem, cancel, and destroy an amount of the circulating notes of such association equal to the amount issued upon such bonds: Provided, That the bonds on deposit with the Treasurer shall not be reduced below $50,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will allow that amendment to be offered and be pending. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARWELL,] also a member of the committee, desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. FARWELL. I move to strike out the eighth section of the bill and to insert that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually, and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. as therein prescribed shall be applied solely to the non-interest-bearing debt of the United States known as United States notes, which said notes, when purchased, shall be canceled and forever retired from circulation. The first application of said 1 per cent. to the purposes aforesaid shall be made after the 1st day of July, 1874, and within that fiscal year.

Mr. MAYNARD. My colleague on the committee from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] desires to offer an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to add to section 2 the following:

Provided, That in case any increase of national-bank note circulation beyond the present authorized limit of $354,000,000 shall take place, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel legal-tender notes to the extent of such increase until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes shall be reduced to $300,000,000; and for this purpose he is authorized to use any existing surplus revenue, or, in default of any such surplus, to sell 5 per cent. bonds of the Government.

The SPEAKER. That exhausts the power of amending the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now call the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is impossible for the House to understand the present condition of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the precise attitude of the bill. As the bill now stands there are two amendments pending; one offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to strike out the eighth section and insert what has been read; the other an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] to the second section. Those amendments are to the original bill as reported by the committee. There is besides pending an amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.] All those amendments are offered by members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. This being the status of the bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] calls the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. FARWELL. I withdraw my amendment to the original bill and move it as an additional section to the substitute of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

The SPEAKER. That will be in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not have it pending to both?

Mr. FARWELL. I desire only to have it pending to the substitute.

Mr. POLAND. Two or three days ago I sent to the desk a substitute for the second section of the bill. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to admit that amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. The substance of the gentleman's amendment has been incorporated in the amendment of my associate on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. MITCHELL.] I therefore do not think it proper to yield for that purpose. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIERY] has an amendment which I will hear.

Mr. BIERY. I desire to move to amend by striking out the seventh and eighth sections of the original bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I admit that amendment, and upon the bill and pending amendments I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The power of amendment is now exhausted.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to have read for the information of the House such amendments as the gentleman from Tennessee declines to admit?

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent.

Mr. COBURN. I ask to have an amendment read for information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MAYNARD. I made the motion yesterday that all gentlemen having propositions in the nature of amendments should be allowed to print them in the RECORD. I do not wish to deny to any gentleman the opportunity to present his peculiar views in that form, but I cannot yield further.

Mr. COBURN. This amendment has not been printed in the RECORD.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question should not be sustained, will there then be an opportunity for the House to consider other amendments?

The SPEAKER. There will be after the pending amendments shall have been disposed of. There are now as many amendments pending as the rules permit; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has objected to any more being moved.

Mr. KELLEY. I have already announced my purpose to move a substitute, and I hope I shall have an opportunity.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary question. In the present position of this bill, if the previous question should be sustained, will it be possible for the House in any stage of the voting to act on the Senate bill upon this subject which is now on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It will not, of course.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then, if the previous question is not seconded, will it be competent to move a postponement of this bill until next Tuesday, at half-past one o'clock, so that we may then take the Senate bill from the table and consider it in connection with this bill?

The SPEAKER. That is entirely within the power of the majority of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the Chair be good enough to state again the substance of the answer he just made to my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts desired the Chair to state whether, if the previous question were seconded, it would be competent for the House under its operation to consider the Senate bill upon this subject now upon the Speaker's table. The Chair answered that it would not be. The gentleman then asked whether, if the previous question should be voted down, a motion to postpone would be in order. Of course it would. The bill would be left subject to the disposition of a majority vote in any direction the House might choose.

Mr. RANDALL. And then in the mean time all these various amendments could be printed; could they not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing in the rules to forbid it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when will it be in order to move to lay this whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order now. Does the gentleman desire to make that motion?

Mr. COX. Would it be in order at a later period?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to make that motion, now is the time, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How far will the previous question operate?

The SPEAKER. It will operate until the disposition of all the amendments and to the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. So that if the previous question be now seconded no other amendments can be offered.

The SPEAKER. Of course not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 124.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until half-past one o'clock next Tuesday, my intention being at that time to have the Senate bill taken up and considered.

Several MEMBERS. Take it up now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As I understand, we cannot get it up now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman not to take a solid day of next week.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, there were—ayes 94, noes 113.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to lay the bill and amendments upon the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand tellers on the pending motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What is the motion? I do not think it is understood.

The SPEAKER. It is that the further consideration of the bill and amendments be postponed until Tuesday morning next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When that is done I will then move to go to the business on the Speaker's table to take up the Senate bill.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. COX were appointed.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Indiana moved that the bill and amendments be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order while the House is dividing.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 100.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. If this motion prevails can we then by a majority vote go to the Speaker's table and take up the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER It is in the power of the majority to do that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I give notice I will make that motion as soon as we get through with this.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 133, nays 121, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HALE, of Maine, said: My colleague, Mr. HERSEY, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House adjourns, and this question goes over, when does it come up again?

The SPEAKER. If the House should now adjourn, it will come up as unfinished business to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Pending the announcement of the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn,

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Before the House adjourns, I ask that the Senate bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Senate bill is as follows:

A bill to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

SEC. 2. That forty-six millions in notes for circulation in addition to such circulation now allowed by law shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter, and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870. And each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

Mr. COBURN. I ask that an amendment I have desired to offer to the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COBURN'S amendment is as follows:

Strike out in lines 29 and 30 the words "outstanding and in circulation at any one time," and insert the words "which shall be issued permanently." And also insert after the word "law" in the thirty-second line, these words, "and for the purposes of a reserve;" so that the proviso shall read as follows:

That the entire amount of United States notes which shall be permanently issued shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000 now authorized by existing law. And for the purposes of a reserve that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue the sum of $50,000,000 of United States notes, in excess of the sum of $400,000,000 hereinbefore authorized to be issued, in any of the denominations now authorized by law, which he shall hold, to be exchanged on demand of the holder for an equivalent amount at their par value of United States bonds, which bonds shall be by said Secretary placed in the Treasury of the United States, to be delivered to the person so exchanging them at any time within twelve months from that date; and after the expiration of that time to be delivered to any citizen of the United States presenting an equivalent amount of said United States notes; and thereafter the said notes shall be held for like exchange upon demand and the deposit of like bonds as hereinbefore provided. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the interest which may accrue upon said bonds while on deposit as aforesaid in the Treasury before delivering them in exchange for United States notes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the bill as amended, and the amendments which are pending, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency is, as amended, as follows:

A bill to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 31 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 2. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained. And the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and section 21 of the original act to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment, be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted.

SEC. 3. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer or to any assistant treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Comptroller of the Currency to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally on the first day of each month or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum, in United States notes, equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or, if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes instead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

SEC. 4. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon deposit of lawful money within the meaning of said acts, in sums of not less than $10,000, with the Treasurer of the United States, withdraw a proportionate amount of bonds deposited in pledge for such circulation; and he shall redeem, cancel, and destroy an amount of the circulating notes of such association equal to the amount issued upon such bonds.

SEC. 5. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury, in payment or deposit for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter numbers of the associations by which they are severally issued.

SEC. 7. That associations without circulation may be organized under the provisions of the said act, upon the deposit, with the Treasurer of the United States, of not less than $10,000 of United States registered bonds, as provided in section 16 of said act; and associations already organized without circulation are authorized to withdraw their bonds in excess of $10,000.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the beginning of each and every month from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange, and as a substitute, for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt, and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

The following amendments are pending:

By Mr. MITCHELL:

Add to section 2 the following:

Provided, That in case any increase of national-bank note circulation beyond the present authorized limit of $354,000,000 shall take place, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel legal-tender notes to the extent of such increase until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes shall be reduced to $300,000,000; and for this purpose he is authorized to use any existing surplus revenue, or, in default of any such surplus, to sell 5 per cent. bonds of the Government.

By Mr. BIERY:

Strike out sections 7 and 8 of the bill.

By Mr. MERRIAM:

The following as a substitute for the original bill:

That section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and section 21 of the original act, to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment, be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted; and that section 1 of the act entiiled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained.

SEC. 2. That section 31 of the said act approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act approved June 30, 1864, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum, in United States notes, equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed, under penalty of forfeiture of charter. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or, if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes instead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

SEC. 4. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury, in payment, or deposit for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter numbers of the association by which they are severally issued.

SEC. 6. That any national bank desiring to withdraw a portion of its circulation may, upon deposit of United States notes in sums of not less than $9,000 with the Treasurer of the United States, withdraw bonds pledged to secure a like amount of its circulation; and the Treasurer shall redeem, cancel, and destroy an amount of the circulating notes of such association equal to the amount issued upon such bonds: Provided, That the bonds on deposit with the Treasurer shall not be reduced below $50,000.

By Mr. FARWELL:

Add to Mr. MERRIAM'S substitute the following, as an additional section:

That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually, and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. as therein prescribed shall be applied solely to the non-interest-bearing debt of the United States known as United States notes, which said notes, when purchased, shall be canceled and forever retired from circulation. The first application of said 1 per cent. to the purposes aforesaid shall be made after the 1st day of July, 1874, and within that fiscal year.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 10, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, an abstract of the militia force of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail, each way, over the Cairo, Arkansas and Texas Railroad between Cairo, Illinois, and Poplar Bluff, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of a large number of citizens of the State of Ohio, praying for an alteration of the tariff making the duty on tin plates specific instead of ad valorem; and I desire to say, as a great number of similar petitions have been sent to us, that, as a matter of course, no action can be had by this body until some tariff bill or tax bill comes to the Senate from the House of Representatives which will enable action to be taken by us. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, praying for an appropriation to test a new welded cast iron of great strength for ordnance, and a new and superior twelve-inch breech-loading rifled cannon recently patented; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of Dr. B. Chrisman and other citizens of Virginia, praying the establishment of an army and naval hospital for invalids at Massanutta Springs, in the county of Rockingham, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Isaac Bloom, a citizen of New Orleans, Louisiana, being in the nature of an appeal from the decision of the commissioners of claims, under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, praying a thorough revision of his claim for property taken by Major-Generals Grant and Sherman, in May, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of New Ulm, Minnesota, praying that a pension may be allowed to Jacob Mix, a citizen of that State, who was wounded, while commanding the militia called out to resist the hostile incursions of the Sioux Indians, in August, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Thomas Duff, of Hendricks County, Indiana, late a corporal in Company H, Seventh Regiment Kentucky Infantry, praying the passage of a special act giving him arrears of pension from the date of his discharge on a surgeon's certificate of disability; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEWART. I present a memorial of merchants, importers, and dealers in tin plates who present to Congress the expediency of converting the present ad valorem duty into an equivalent specific duty, and they go on to assign reasons for it. The memorial is signed by dealers in tin-plate in various parts of the country. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I also present a memorial very unanimously signed by the people of Storey County, Nevada, Gold Hill and Virginia City, protesting against the passage of a bill limiting the time for taking out mining patents. They set forth that it would be very injurious to their interests, and they protest against the passage of that bill. I also present in connection with this very numerously signed petition, which includes a large portion of the miners of that important county, the proceedings and resolutions of a mass meeting of miners, setting forth their reasons against the passage of the bill. The bill, I believe, passed the Senate and was amended in the House and has come back with an amendment and is now before the Committee on Mines and Mining. I move that the proceedings of this meeting and the memorial be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Abraham Van Assum, late of Company B, Fifty-first New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Indiana and Kentucky, praying an amendment to the second section of the act relating to the construction of bridges across the Ohio River so as to provide for one continuous span of four hundred feet or two pivot drawings of one hundred and sixty feet each, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition; which was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1370) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle and pay the accounts of William Pelham, late surveyor-general of New Mexico, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 463) supplementary to an act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, approved January 22, 1873, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SPENCER. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 2423) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," to report it back and recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill. I desire to say in this connection that the committee are satisfied that the present law is sufficient for all the purposes asked for in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 486) to revive and continue certain grants of land heretofore made to the Territory and State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of the several lines of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 686) for aid of geological and other surveys in the several States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 687) providing that postage upon documents printed by authority of Congress or of either House thereof shall not be required to be prepaid, but may be left to be paid by the persons or parties receiving the same; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LICENSING OF CANAL-BOATS.

Mr. SCOTT. I was not in my seat yesterday when a bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce which is of very pressing importance, and I ask leave to take it up that it may be passed at the present time. It is House bill No. 2549.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793. It provides that the act to which it is a supplement shall not be so construed as to extend the provisions of the act named in the title to canal-boats or boats employed on the internal waters or canals of any State; and all such boats, excepting only such as are provided with sails or propelling machinery of their own adapted to lake or coastwise navigation, and excepting such as are employed in trade with the Canadas, shall be exempt from the provisions of that act, and from the payment of all customs and other fees under any act of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the Navy Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see the use of publishing the Navy Register. We have no power to distribute them.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is a very small number, which gives Senators but seven or eight apiece. We have generally printed four or five times that number.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed it was understood in the Senate that we would not print any documents at all for distribution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hardly consider so small a number as this to be a printing for distribution.

Mr. SHERMAN. It involves the Government in the full amount of expense for setting up the type.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; the document is set up. The expense under this resolution will be $100.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems rather too small a matter to make a point upon now, but I intend to object when any resolution is offered to print public documents when we cannot distribute them and they are lying in great masses in our folding-room.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing at this session have not reported in favor of printing a single document for distribution after the evidence of the disposition of the Senate, in which the committee fully concurred, to pass a resolution directing certain printing to be discontinued; but we supposed these very small numbers that Senators wish to give to libraries, &c., may be printed to public advantage; but I have no interest in it if other Senators have not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not make a point on this because it seems rather small; but at the same time I see no reason why we should print five hundred copies of the Navy Register for our distribution. They are printed for the Navy Department, and every officer of the Navy who is interested can get them there, or get them from the Public Printer at cost.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are very convenient at libraries and for purposes of reference.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senate will not come to a definite conclusion just yet to print no more documents for distribution. My own experience is that there is no difficulty in getting rid of public documents. Since I have partially informed my own constituents that documents can be had here upon paying postage, I have found a very free delivery. I find a large body of constituents—and they are only partially informed of the fact—who are very eager to get them on those terms, and I get orders by every mail, sometimes inclosing postgage and sometimes ordering the books to be sent by express, and sometimes as freight, and I have but very few documents left. I think some arrangement can be made by and by for distributing our documents and getting them into hands where they will be appreciated quite as much as they have been appreciated under that system of miscellaneous distribution which I have heretofore indulged in and I suppose other Senators have.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope we shall not break through what seems to have been our custom for some months past, of not printing books for distribution by Congress. There is no method provided by law by which we can distribute them, and of course it is an enormous tax to us to distribute them. I think it has been stated here in debate that it costs somewhere about $2,000 for each Senator or Member of Congress to distribute the books which heretofore he has been required annually to distribute. As long as we print these books our constituents will write to us for them, and we cannot refuse such requests, and the tax is really very heavy. I received during the past week a letter from quite a wealthy man, requesting me to send him a certain series of volumes, and to comply with his request would cost me about twenty dollars. If it is understood by the country generally that we do not print books for distribution by Congress, these demands will cease to come. As long as they do come, although the tax is so very heavy, we have to comply with them.

I think, unless there is some provision by law for the distribution of documents whereby members will be relieved of the great burden it imposes, we ought not to print them; certainly we ought not to print them and allow them to encumber the rooms in the basement of the Capitol. I trust my friend from Rhode Island will see the propriety of this suggestion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think this is precisely on the line of what my friend from California suggests. Printing five hundred copies of a document is not printing it for popular distribution; it will give us but seven or eight apiece.

Mr. SARGENT. It is in that direction, and I think we had better not do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. ANTHONY. If I am permitted, I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection, but I think it would be better to take the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will withdraw the resolution, with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. We shall have to have a count of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is a quorum present.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not care which way it is done. We shall have to have the yeas and nays, or do something, I suppose, to decide whether a quorum is present. I think another division would show a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again submit the question to the Senate on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOWE. This is simply a proposition to print five hundred copies, as I understand, of the Navy Register. Whatever may be the opinion of the Senate upon the general subject of printing documents for distribution, I hope the Senate will not refuse to print this number of this particular document at this particular time; and I am especially anxious that the Senate shall not at this time put itself in the attitude of fixed opposition to the printing of documents for distribution. I repeat again that the American people will take these documents and will be glad to get them, and will pay for their transmission through the mails, if you will say that they may have them on those terms.

I want to say to my friend from California that I do not think he is under any obligation to pay twenty dollars or twenty cents to send that list of documents to his constituent. If he will let him know what the postage is, I have no doubt he will be very glad to contribute the postage. If he will not do so, I will not undertake to advise my friend what he should do, though I can only say what I should do: I should not send the documents.

Mr. SARGENT. I will say to my friend that when a law shall be passed providing that the people shall have these documents at some cheap rate, I will vote with him for printing them; but mean while, in the absence of any legislation of that kind, if a Senator desires one of these documents, or two or three, he can at any time get them from the Department. If it is necessary that these additional copies shall be printed for the use of the Department I will vote for that, as I have in every case voted for a reasonable number for the Departments to distribute, because there is a provision of law giving them postage stamps to do it with.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to suggest to my friend that we have an abundance of law for the distribution of them already. We can inform our constituents that they can have these documents for so much, and if you just inform them that the law will authorize the sending of them on the postage being paid, they will pay the postage. Now what is the embarrassment, what is the difficulty in the way of getting them off?

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a member of the Committee on Printing I have agreed to the printing of a limited number of public documents, and I am in favor of the proposition to print five hundred copies of this document. I have done so all along because I thought that Congress would perhaps take some steps to provide for the distribution by members of Congress of the public documents that are printed. I am clearly myself in favor of some action by Congress to enable the members of Congress to send these documents, without cost to themselves, to their constituents.

There are many books that are published that are valuable. For instance, take the mining reports. To gentlemen engaged in the mining business those reports are very valuable of course, and it is right that they should have them through their Representatives and Senators in Congress. Take the Agricultural Report. The farmers of the country, many I know personally, do appreciate the Agricultural Report. I never had as many copies of it as I had calls for; I mean by that, as people were glad to receive and always appreciated.

Now, notwithstanding the repeal of the franking privilege, I am in favor of adopting some mode at the present session of Congress to send those books to our constituents. I should not have voted for the repeal of the franking privilege if I had been in the Senate, which I was not at the time, not because I desire the privilege of franking any documents, but because the people that I represent may want them. The fact is the franking privilege, as our experience proves, is a labor to us all, and it is only in behalf of the constituents which I have the honor in part to represent that I would be willing to undertake the labor, not for any other purposes whatever; but I am ready to vote to restore the franking privilege. I am willing to limit it expressly to books published by Congress; but I would restore it as it was. In my judgment it ought never to have been repealed, and in my judgment it would not have been repealed had it not been made a plank in a political platform. I do not believe it was the judgment of members of Congress apart from party considerations that ever induced its repeal; and I for one would restore it to-day if I could, and give to members of Congress the privilege of distributing books, garden-seeds, &c., to their constituents.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I shall vote for this resolution, and I hope the Senate will continue to print documents, and that members will distribute them. Congress voted to abolish what was styled the franking privilege, and on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] declared that no allowance for postage should thereafter be made to members. It was universally recognized as one of the duties of members of Congress to distribute the documents published for that purpose. By the law, as it then stood, these documents were transmitted as free matter, under the frank or signature of a member of Congress. When Congress abolished this provision of law, and provided that no allowance should be made to members for postage, I suppose it was intended that members should pay the postage upon all mail matter which had previously been transmitted under the frank. I understood this to be imposing upon every Senator about $1,000 per annum in postage. I thought this was unjust, and therefore voted against the bill. But the bill passed. The superintendent of documents has furnished me a statement that the postage on documents alone, based upon the amount published in the last Congress, will be $921.87 per annum. The other postage paid by members upon matter of public business will be at least $200 per annum; that is, $1,121.87 in all, per annum. This change in the law, together with the abolition of mileage, which averaged about $400 to each member, and the abolition of allowance for stationery, $125 per annum, were reasons, among others, which induced me to vote for the increase of salary to the amount of $7,500.

The old compensation was as follows:

Salary	$5,000 00
Average mileage	400 00
Postage saved by the frank	1,121 87
Allowance for stationery	125 00
Total	6,646 87

The pay by the new law was		7,500 00
Average traveling expenses		100 00
From this deduct postage as above	$1,121 87
Stationery	125 00
Leaving		6,353 13

In other words, the pay fixed by the new bill was $293.74 less than the old pay.

But the people have demanded the repeal of the new law, and if our pay continues as fixed at present, and we pay postage on the distribution of documents and other mail matter, our accounts will stand as follows: We receive—

Salary	$5,000 00
Average mileage	400 00
For stationery	125 00
	5,525 00
Deduct from this our postage	1,121 87
Remainder	4,403 13

I do not regard this as excessive pay for the labor we perform. But, as the people have dictated this result, I propose to abide by it. I shall vote to publish the documents which have heretofore been published, and I shall distribute my quota of them.

This is a Government by the people. We are their agents and servants. They have a right to know what we are doing. This they cannot know if we suppress the sources of original information. By doing this we put ourselves in the power of the press, who from the nature of things can give only partial statements, which, made ever so honestly, must always give an imperfect and often an erroneous impression. Every lawyer knows that a digest is always unreliable, and often misleads as to the effect of the decision pretended to be condensed. Without the distribution of documents members of Congress are at the mercy of any one who may choose to misrepresent them. We cannot inform the country of the real nature of our proceedings unless we send the people the original sources of information, and not somebody's digest of them, somebody's construction of them, sombody's guess or inference from a casual reading of them. I propose to vote for publishing the documents that we have published, and I propose to distribute mine, and pay the postage, for the purpose of giving the people this information.

The idea of divorcing the Government from the people, as we must do if we stop distributing the documents which are published by Congress, strikes me as being a fatal blow at the theory of our government and its perfect administration. The people should know what we are doing and should know it accurately and truly, and while Congress is too virtuous to frank a document and let it go at the expense of the nation, let us pay our postage, and if we have not anything left, we do not come here to make money; we do not come here to get our expenses even. We come here as we are informed by the people, and I now fully believe it, for the glory of the thing. Now, let us take the glory and let us spend the few dollars we have left over our boardbills in paying the postage on these documents; and as long as that method of administration is agreeable to the majority of Congress no member has a right to complain; and when it gets to be disagreeable, Congress can provide that these documents, being certified to by the printing office or by a clerk in the Senate or by some other officer to be appointed, shall go from Washington to the people free of postage.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall vote for the resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island. I voted to abolish the franking privilege and would do so again. Congress had to abolish the franking privilege in self-defense. It had become a public scandal to which no answer could be made. Its abuse was grossly exaggerated. It was made to embrace in popular estimation ten or twelve times what it actually comprehended. It was necessary for Congress to abolish the franking privilege to relieve itself from a scandal from which it could escape in no other way.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought to be an amendment to the law, by which postage on documents published by Congress should not be required to be prepaid, but let it be paid by those persons who receive the documents. When our constituents write here for documents, as they are doing continually, they are always willing to pay the postage on them, and a simple change of the law would relieve members of Congress from a hardship that is now imposed upon them.

A friend writes to me for a book; perhaps the postage on it will be seventy-five cents or it may be a dollar. I cannot afford to write back to him and say, "The postage upon this document is so much; if you will send me the money I will forward it to you." That would be a small business. I must either send the document at my own expense, or I must not send it at all. In every such case the constituent would be willing to pay the postage, and if we were to make a change in the law, so that the postage upon public documents need not be prepaid, it would relieve us from this burden and I have no doubt meet with the general approbation of the people. For one I should be glad to see such a change in the law made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish the Senate would be consistent in regard to the franking privilege by taking and keeping position on one side or the other. Every time a report is made in favor of printing documents, we are told that it is an exceptional case for some reason. I think it is not exceptional in one instance more than another; yet in deference to the judgment of others, always heretofore I have abstained from saying a word against these reports in favor of printing. Now as a question has been raised by others, it seems to me time to pause and elect which side of this question we will hold.

I voted to repeal the franking privilege, not however on the ground on which the Senator from Indiana rested his vote. I voted to repeal the franking privilege in order to try, and try fairly, an experiment, the judgment having become general that the franking privilege, and the expenditures it brought about, were on the whole unwise, if not evil. It was said that great sums were expended in printing books and documents, that other sums were expended in procuring, germinating, and rearing plants and shrubs and propagating bulbs and various growths of vegetation, which in their distribution incumbered the mails and were sent over the country with but little benefit. Other things encouraged by the franking privilege were thought to be unwise and too costly. Therefore I voted, not in fear of libels or falsehoods unfounded, not because I thought it a convenient way to defend myself against unfounded scandal, but because I thought the experiment worth trying. Since the abolition of the franking privilege Congress has never accepted and tried the result. We have cut off our power of franking letters and the privilege of receiving letters free, and if I were to tell my own story of postage it would sound like exaggerated complaint.

We have put ourselves in a very odd position. The postage upon documents which have heretofore been printed amounts I think to $920 for each Senator, according to a tabulated statement I have seen. The Senator from Indiana says that when a friend writes for a book you may abstain from sending it, and that costs you no postage. Yes, Mr. President, that you may do; but how as to the current postage of other kinds? I read somewhere the other day that $300 would send ten thousand letters, and it was asked how could anybody be called upon for more postage than that? Whoever made the statement must have been only partially informed.

My experience is like that of others, I suppose. I receive continually packages of papers with perhaps only a three-cent postage-stamp, and a mark "due nine cents" or "due twelve cents;" sometimes "due eighteen cents," or whatever the balance may be. That must be paid. The papers come usually with the request that I shall send them to somebody, or return them to somebody. If they are to be returned to the person from whom they come, I need not hesitate to put my three-cent stamp upon it when it goes back and leave him to find upon the envelope "due twelve cents" or "due eighteen cents;" but as it commonly happens that the papers are to be sent to some other person, that will hardly do; and thus the result to me is that I pay in the first place the arrears of postage, and then I pay the entire advance of postage when I transmit the paper again, and out of the transaction may come two or three letters beside, and upon those going from me I also pay postage. During some weeks I pay more postage than a single man, when I was younger, used as a rule to pay for his board and lodging.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator whether the documents he refers to relate to his private business?

Mr. CONKLING. In no sense whatever. They are the petitions and papers of soldiers and others, many of whom doubtless do not understand the number of stamps required to pay the postage fully in advance, some of whom very likely deposit them not knowing that they cannot go to Senator or Representative without postage; and being held for postage, one stamp or some inadequate stamp has been put upon them. I speak not of anything which concerns private correspondence. I speak of the correspondence which comes to me from a constituency numbering nearly five million people; and if the experience of other members of the Senate in respect of the imposition of postage upon them under the existing state of things is like mine, it seems to me that we shall be compelled to make some provision in regard to it, in place of leaving it on the unjust and untenable ground on which it now stands.

I turned aside, however, to allude to this, and I have nothing more to say about it now. Coming back to the matter of public documents, we persist in printing them. How it may be with the seeds and bulbs in all cases, I do not know; but I still receive from the Commissioner of Agriculture now and then a notice that he has sent me a large package of seeds, or of products of the earth whatever they may be. I do not know what to do with them. I cannot write to those interested to know whether they would be willing to pay the expressage upon them. I do not feel called upon, I do not feel able to pay myself the large sum the postage would amount to. Thus with the franking privilege abolished, and suffering a heavy tax on letter correspondence as we do, we are continually piling up embarrassment, by printing document after document, for what? My honorable friend who always speaks wisely [Mr. HOWE] said, if I understood him, that we could make it known to the people that by writing to us they could get these documents in some way or other. Well, if we had nothing else to do, if we could devote hours to writing all about and explaining to every one how this is and if we could direct to whom letters and applications might be addressed and how much applicants must send and all that, making every Senator a sort of bureau of distribution, I could see how that way might do, but we have no time for it.

It is the evil, it is the curse of public life, one which any civil-service reform adapted to correct would be of more value than all other civil-service reforms I have heard of, that Senators and Representatives incumbered with labors, with sworn duties which no man can adequately discharge, are oppressed and perplexed incessantly and their time frittered away by thousands of private errands, by matters having nothing to do with the duties within the purview of the oath we all take. This is a subject on which I should like to say something. I object, in the interest of the people, in the interest of civil-service reform, in the interest of public business, to any contrivance which is to load upon Senators any more necessity than there is now for writing letters by the thousand, making arrangements at the printing office, making arrangements through clerks, doing business and errands inconsistent with the great necessity that rests upon us all to employ every activity we have in the public business.

If documents were still to be distributed under a frank we might do as I imagine we all used to do, as I used to do, first pay a man for addressing them, and then seizing such scraps of time as may be found for franking the white slips which used to be furnished to us, and in the course of a few days, in the odds and ends of time that could be given to the purpose, we were able to frank enough to send off a large number of these documents. That we could do. But when you come to the idea that we are to write to all persons who apply to us explaining that they can send the money to us, and then we are to buy stamps and put them on, and to go and see some clerk and arrange with him or with the printer, I submit it is entirely inconsistent with a discharge of the manifold duties, public and obligatory in their nature, that rest upon us.

If I had my way I would stop the printing of books; I would stop the outgo of seeds; I would accept in its logical results the abolition of the franking privilege and try it. Then, if it be true that the people are opposed to an abuse of the franking privilege, such as occurs when members or committees send out speeches—which I have heard urged as one of the abuses, but which I had supposed to be one of the objects of it, to diffuse and distribute intelligence—if the people are opposed to that abuse of the franking privilege, or to other abuses of the franking privilege, or to the franking privilege itself, so that they prefer its abolition to the advantages which the franking privilege would give, we shall all know it and get a mature judgment, having actually tried the experiment. But it is one of the necessities of human proceeding that by actual experiment you can try only one side of a question at a time. Now we are trying neither side. We are carrying along a little of the abolition and a little of the reverse, paying a large sum of postage upon such documents as go, leaving the great body of them to what destiny ultimately we do not know, and still going on printing and piling up, so as to incur a large part of the expense the saving of which was the great argument against the franking privilege.

I shall vote against this resolution. Although the number is small and the book I believe is small, the principle is the same. I will vote against printing any documents until the Senate comes to some resolution to adopt some mode, whatever it may be, in which they can be distributed. Then, if so be the judgment of the Senate, let us go on printing; but if it is the judgment of the Senate to adhere to the abolition of the franking privilege with its logical results, then let us stop incurring the expense and piling up the books which come out of these motions to print.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand this is a resolution to print five hundred copies of the Navy Register for the use of the Senate. That comes from the Committee on Printing; and the chairman of this committee will allow me to express a little surprise at it in consideration of the fact that in the early days of this session we passed a bill repealing all acts for the publication of documents of a particular character, and appended to it an amendment suspending all resolutions and acts authorizing the publication of any documents at all for distribution. That is pending in the other House; and the House, I understand, are considering that question.

I state the proposition in this way for the purpose of bringing the matter distinctly to the notice of the Senate. This involves the question, which was then in the mind unquestionably of the Committee on Printing, of the practicability under present circumstances of printing public documents for distribution. Now, that we shall print public documents for the Departments, for the Government itself, will always be a necessity of course; but when you come to the question of printing public documents for popular use, then you touch that old sore which did become a sore on the body-politic, and was, in the language of my honorable friend from Indiana, a scandal on Congress. It was undeniably and unquestionably for many years an abuse. The simple publication of documents had come to be a very great abuse. Those who know anything about the publication of documents in former years are aware how much we had improved upon that condition of things even before the abolition of the franking privilege. There were formerly documents of a very expensive character published in every department of the public service; and, perhaps more than to anything else, the popular disfavor which came to exist was attributable to that fact.

But, Mr. President, independent of any abuse at all, it is a question that is brought to the attention of Congress at the present time; it is an important question; and we ought to settle it. We ought to settle it now. The circumstances of the times favor it. My own belief about it is that we ought not to undertake to publish the general documents of the Government for popular distribution. In the first place, it is not practicable. Take, for instance, the documents which are most numerously published. I believe the Agricultural Report is more largely published than any other document. We publish, say fifty thousand for the Senate and two hundred and fifty thousand for the House, making a total of three hundred thousand. How many voters are there in this country? Four millions and a half. What are you to do with your three hundred thousand agricultural reports toward popularizing and enlightening these four millions and a half of voters, each man of whom, of course, ought to have one? The statement of such a proposition as that shows the inutility of the whole thing. I believe in this distribution of these documents, each Senator situated as I am—I do not know whether it is fixed by States or by the population of the States—I get some five hundred or six hundred, and I represent a constituency of 600,000. Is not that a rich thing for me for distribution, and what a popular thing and how I popularize that work by sending six hundred copies of it in the best way I can to six hundred thousand constituents! And what is true of that is true in a very much larger sense of all the other documents we publish. Besides, look at the expense of this thing. The Lord only knows what it costs. That cannot be estimated.

Mr. CONKLING. About sixty-eight cents a volume, we are informed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Sixty-eight cents a volume is what it costs to print the Agricultural Report; but what does it cost to get it up, and when it is gotten up what is it? It is what the States are issuing and reissuing every year; and when you look at the enterprise that exists in the publishers of the several States, those great houses in New York and Boston, how do all these little things dwindle in comparison with the efforts those men make in the departments of literature and science? Go over there; look at it yourself; see who is at the head of it; and say what you would expect to come of it; see the corps of men who are in it on little stipends, enough to starve any man, and can you expect anything like enterprise to come of that? And are we going to set ourselves up as the educators of the people on that stinted and narrow style of things? You have only to go to the establishments in New York of the Harpers and the Appletons and that style of men and see on what scale they educate the people, and then contrast it with this sort of education, and see whether as an educational institution you think yours here amounts to much, whether it pays. My friend says it costs sixty-eight cents perhaps to print one of these volumes. It costs forty-two or forty-five cents to send it out. The Appletons or the Harpers will produce that entire book, printed, bound, made up, and edited, for less money, and in better style too. We cannot afford to do that thing.

But, Mr. President, this is no time to argue this question, but it is a time to consider it. I suggest to my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject properly belongs—and there is none more competent than he to consider it wisely and profoundly—that he address himself to the consideration of this proposition involved in the action of the Senate at the beginning, that we will not print documents for distribution; and especially that we will adhere to this resolution of the Senate until that question is thoroughly considered; and being thoroughly considered, if it is advisable to print documents for distribution that we shall provide the ways and the means for that distribution.

The generosity of my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] is without stint or limit of course. He is always gushing on that subject; but how few of us are there who are willing to make ourselves victims like him in such a cause? My honorable friend will excuse me from enlisting in any such enterprise as that on account of the sentiments that I certainly honestly and sincerely entertain on this whole subject, that we are not, after all, doing as much good as we make ourselves believe in educating the popular mind by this little driblet contribution of public documents; that it does not pay; that when we put our hands into the Treasury to pay the bills and lay the heavy hand of taxation on the people it does not begin to pay; that this is that kind of intelligence that the people can best gather up and impart to themselves, and it may be left to them. So that we publish to the world all our documents and all the information we gather and make it accessible to them, we can trust the people to help themselves.

I therefore hope, as this case, which is certainly far from being exceptional, of printing five hundred copies of the Navy Register for distribution among the people, is the least praiseworthy, as it seems to me, and the least of all the public documents demanded by the people, it will not be made an exception to the general rule which the Senate adopted at the beginning of the session, not to publish any more documents until we had settled the principle upon which they should be published and distributed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was quite reluctant originally to adopt the principle of abolishing the franking privilege, because I had not entire faith that it was to be a measure of economy as represented at the time. It was, it will be remembered, proclaimed that we were about to save $4,000,000 by the abolition of the franking privilege. I did not fully believe it, but yet I finally voted for it in order to test the experiment. It seems to have been tested; and instead of saving three or four million dollars, I think the expenditures of the Government have been increased to that amount, or nearly that.

But there was one thing in that measure that may be looked upon as a decided step in reform, and that was the abolition of the printing of documents for distribution. I am in favor of continuing that reform to the end. We know that three-quarters of all the documents that we publish are of very inconsiderable value. There is the Report of the Commissioner of Education, the Smithsonian Report, and possibly the Agricultural Report, that it may be well to print and allow the people to obtain them by paying the cost price. I do most emphatically object to beginning this business of printing public documents with the small number of five hundred of the Navy Register, in order after that shall have passed as a precedent and we have again readopted the practice of distribution to bring in a proposition for printing two or three hundred thousand of the Agricultural Report or of other public documents.

It is true that when the repeal of the franking privilege was up I did move an amendment proposing that it should not be made the excuse for raising the pay of members of Congress. I was quite satisfied when this question was mooted that it was the purpose to abolish the franking privilege and then to increase our salaries, as was afterward done. But there is one thing that I think in the end we shall be most likely to adopt, and that is the practice in France and England of publishing our documents at the cost price, and letting everybody have them who will pay that price for them, and then after the experiment shall have been sufficiently demonstrated that there is nothing really to be saved by the abolition of the franking privilege on letters and speeches, I am not sure that I shall not be ready to vote to restore that portion of it. I think that that is a privilege, not of the member but of the people, that they have a right to send and receive their letters free of postage, and also to receive speeches. But so far as the documents are concerned, I trust the Government will not again enter into the business of a great book-publishing house.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, entirely independent of the very broad question as to the printing of vast numbers of public documents for gratuitous distribution, and connected with that the method of distributing them under the franks of members of Congress, I consider that the present resolution should pass the Senate. The number, five hundred copies of the Navy Register, is a moderate number of a very necessary record, necessary especially for the families and those closely connected in interest with the officers of the Navy. For that reason I shall vote in favor of the resolution for printing this limited number of an exceedingly desirable book, but I desire that at some future time the other broader and more important question of the publication of documents for gratuitous distribution on the theory of educating the people and combined with that the method of distributing them by means of franking shall come up, and that then it shall receive, what it never has received, a worthy consideration at the hands of the Senate. The subject has been treated in my opinion in the most unworthy and unstatesmanlike manner from beginning to end. This present resolution I desire to vote upon separate and apart from that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for a division because I think it is well to settle the question. I do not propose now, almost at the expiration of the morning hour, to reply to some of the remarks which have been made in regard to public documents on which evidently the Senators have not informed themselves so wisely as they might, but I will take occasion to do that at another time.

Mr. HOWE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Indiana desires that the matter shall go over, and I have no objection.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. Is not the question on my amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California being to a subsequent part of the bill to that to which the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut was offered, is not an amendment to the amendment and is out of order at present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM.]

Mr. SARGENT. That occurred to me; but if the first be adopted the last would be entirely unnecessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The end can be reached, if that is the will of the Senate, by voting down the first amendment and then adopting the second.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the question is taken I would like to suggest a modification of my amendment. The amendment which I proposed yesterday read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize any railroad company to enter any Indian reservation or have the right of way over the same without the written permission of the Secretary of the Interior.

Upon the objection still further insisted on of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] I propose to add to that:

And where said reservation is set apart by treaty, the consent of Congress shall first be obtained.

It seems to me that answers every reasonable purpose. I think it is somewhat unfortunate that the discussion of the general Indian policy of the Government should have arisen on this bill. It is really outside of it; and my impression is that there is no necessity either for the first amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut or this one which I now propose, because the bill provides that this right of way shall only be on "unoccupied" land of the United States. Of course Indian reservations are occupied lands, and the companies would not have the right of way there at all. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut would be somewhat to confuse that construction, if it have any effect whatever. If the bill expressly provides that the right shall only be on unoccupied land, that excluding Indian reservations, it is entirely unnecessary to put in another part of the bill that Indian reservations shall be excluded.

I would make a further suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut, that his amendment coming in in the place where it does, causes the text of the bill to read not so smoothly as it ought to. The first section relates to the Territories generally where this shall take place. It defines the jurisdiction of the bill as being in "the Territories of the United States, excepting the Indian Territory"—we well understand what that means—and excepting the District of Columbia. Now to say "excepting Indian reservations" is not really a homogeneous exception, because an Indian reservation is not a Territory of the United States. Therefore there might be a critical objection to the amendment coming in at that place. The amendment which I propose comes in, however, at the end of the eighth section which relates to the right of way, and the proviso which I offer that this right of way shall not be over any Indian reservation whatever without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, and, where those reservations are made in accordance with treaties, that then the consent of Congress shall be given, would seem to cover every point that any Senator could wish to have guarded, especially as the first section which makes the general grant provides that they shall not go upon occupied land.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It might be a serious question whether any particular land was occupied or not. It appears to me that it would not follow of necessity that land was occupied simply because it was set apart as an Indian reservation. Certain limits are defined as belonging to the States, but I am not aware that all parts of the States can be called occupied; and it appears to me to be particularly so with the Indian reservations. The Senator from California proposes to leave this matter to Congress. I think that should be left to congressional action hereafter, whenever application should be made to Congress to act upon a particular case or with reference to the location of a particular road, and should not be put into a bill of this kind. It seems to me that these reservations being set apart for a particular purpose and guaranteed by the Government for that particular object, they should be left as they are, and we should not interfere with them. I hope the amendment which the Senator from California proposes will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I should be glad to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "Territory," in the sixth line of the first section, it is proposed to insert "and Indian reservations in the Territories;" so as to read:

That any number of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory and Indian reservations in the Territories, and the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. Let me say one word. The amendment is to exclude the railroads from crossing Indian reservations at all. We propose, if this is voted down, to adopt the amendment of the Senator from California, which forbids the railroads going across any Indian reservation without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, and, in case the reservation is set aside by treaty, without the consent of Congress. It is proposed to offer that in case this is voted down.

Mr. PRATT. One word before the vote is taken. The Senator from Nevada and also the Senator from California assume that the Indians have no vested rights in these reservations.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator when I ever made such a remark?

Mr. PRATT. The Senator assumes it in the amendment which he offers to the pending amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator's pardon. I supposed he referred to the discussion yesterday, in which I did not mix.

Mr. PRATT. No. I say it because in the amendment which he offers to the pending amendment he assumes that the Secretary of the Interior holds in the hollow of his hand the rights of the Indian tribe whose reservation is appropriated, or a portion of it appropriated, by the company which is incorporated by this bill. Now I deny that main proposition. I do not know what the fashion is nowadays in the creation of Indian reservations; but in times past, when I was familiar with the subject, the practice was when a tribe of Indians was making a grant to the Government of a large body of lands, a smaller body was carved out of it for the perpetual occupancy and use of the tribe, and hence it was called a reservation, something less than what they were granting to the Government; a reservation for the very purpose of their exclusive occupancy. Now, I take it that that originating in contract creates a vested right in the tribe of Indians which Congress has no right whatever to interfere with without the consent of the Indians; and the proposition of my friend from California ignores that view entirely and assumes that the Secretary of the Interior holds the rights of these Indians at his disposal and may by consenting to the grant to the corporation bind the tribe. Now, I wish to enter my protest against that view of the subject.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose now that there is an Indian reservation lying in Montana, as I presume there will be some on that line; a railroad has been built across the mountains; the people of Montana are desirous of having a railroad to connect with the Pacific Railroad; the Indian reservation is there; is there any constitutional or proper way of getting a railroad across that Indian reservation?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, Mr. President; there is a way. If the tribe has any vested rights in the reservation, there is a way to extinguish them by an honest purchase as we have been in the habit of doing in times past. But it ceases to be a reservation; it is nothing if Congress, after creating the reservation, creating it for a good and honest consideration, may trample upon the rights of the tribe by taking a part or the whole of it, or authorizing it to be done. Now you take a portion of the reservation whenever you give to this corporation the right of building a road over it, and appropriating to their own exclusive use a strip one hundred or two hundred feet wide, and the right of running their trains over it during the life-time of the corporation. You trample on the principle of vested rights, and that is what I am protesting against.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very far from sharing in what may be considered border hostility to Indians or Indian rights. During the years in which I had charge of the Indian appropriation bill I was called upon by my duties to fight over this ground, often, too, and it was somewhat a matter of surprise, considering my locality, that I always inclined toward the humanitarian aspect of the question. I did so, however, from conviction; and I do not propose by any action I take in the Senate to obscure a record which I trusted at the time was being well made. I do not think my amendment is liable to the criticisms of my friend, and I will state to him the reasons for this belief. I do not know that he heard the latter clause of the amendment read which I proposed to insert, after hearing the criticism of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is as follows:

And where such reservation is set apart by treaty, the consent of Congress shall first be obtained.

Where it is not set apart by treaty, then I require only executive consent. Now the system which the Senator refers to, of setting aside reservations by treaty, continued until some time in 1869. The last treaties of that kind were those which were made by what was called the Indian peace commission, of which General Sherman was one of the members, and the last reservation made in that way was the Sioux reservation. This and all the reservations before that time, except in some of the Territories, are protected by what may be called treaty stipulations, which I believe bind the faith of the United States; and the rights of the Indians on their lands ought not to be encroached upon, and we have never done it, and I would never consent it should be done, without their consent and without making them compensation for it. I prefer in all such cases where it may be necessary for a railroad to cross such a reservation that Congress, as the best guardian of the Indians, should see that their lands should not be taken, that there should not be even a right of way taken without compensation in damages, without their consent by agreement, such as we made the other day with the Utes when we agreed to buy of them a certain proportion of their land which before that time had been given to them by treaty stipulation, paying them $800,000 for a strip of unoccupied, uncultivated land, which we supposed however to contain mines, and we pay them in installments of $80,000 for ten years. That is one class of cases that is provided for by the latter clause of my amendment.

But there is another kind of reservation which is of a more fugitive and floating character, certain portions of country being designated as places of residence of Indians in certain localities, and they are frequently shifted in their boundaries by executive orders. They are sometimes found to be unhealthy, or not to furnish such facilities of access or for food or sustenance of the Indians as more favored spots would do, and they are moved from them to some better place. Reservations of this kind are erected in Arizona; they are erected in my own State; they are erected in the State of Nevada; they exist to a certain extent in some of the Territories, although there are fewer of this character than there are of those which are protected by treaty stipulations. In cases of that sort I provide that the same executive power which designates them may have the right to modify them in this respect as it does in every other, and it seems to me that I cover the whole ground by these two provisions. But wherever the reservation is in the shape of a treaty regulation guaranteeing the title in the soil, or the user of the soil in the Indians, there I would not allow it to be crossed in any way by a railroad or a turnpike road, or by fugitive parties of citizens, or any persons pursuing a business not legitimately connected with the Government or the tribe, unless Congress saw that justice was done to the Indians and saw also that this easement could be properly afforded. Therefore I think that the amendment which I propose is better than that of the Senator from Connecticut, who treats all these reservations as upon the same level.

I am sorry the Indian question has arisen on this bill; but it being up, I should like to make one remark, the result of some reflection which I have given to the subject. It is, perhaps, too late in the day now to say that our system of Indian reservations is a mistake. The Indians have acquired certain rights. We, however, originated this system of Indian reservations. We have insisted upon it I think to the disadvantage of the Indian. We have retarded his civilization by means of it. From the time when we drove the red man out of Georgia at the call of the prejudices of that locality, and beyond the Mississippi down to the present time, whenever they were crowded by our growing populations we have pushed them farther off, we have herded them together; we have done exactly the opposite thing to that which is done by our neighbors in Canada. The Indians in Canada, under the English system, are civilized; they are more in the condition of the Six Nations of New York; they are agriculturists; they have their farms among themselves; they hold their lands in severalty. As the population of Canada overtook them it passed on beyond them, surrounded them. They became measurably absorbed in that population; they acquired the arts of civilized life to quite a surprising degree. By a law of nature, the most attractive of them, or those least repulsive, became connected in marriage or otherwise with some of the lower classes of the Canadian population, and as the blood became a little more mixed or a little more pure, as you may call it, they gradually rose even in the scale of marriage, until, I am informed by those who have made the system a study in the Canadas, the distinction between the white race and the Indian race is fast disappearing, and that without an extermination of the Indians. This applies to the French portion of Canada of course. They have become absorbed to a certain extent in the populations. I believe that was the best way for us to have pursued. I think we should have saved more of the Indians from perishing under what otherwise has been a barbarous system.

But we have driven the Indians away from our settlements; we have driven them out on the plains. We are now compelled, on account of their narrowing means of subsistence, to furnish them beef-cattle, and furnish them agricultural instruments, seeds, &c., and do the best we can under the disadvantageous circumstances in which we have placed them. But, sir, believing that we are to blame in this policy and not they, although they are principally the sufferers by it, I am in favor of humanity toward them, the strictest observance of every right they have, and where the right was doubtful I would solve the doubt in their favor. I have stood up for this principle in Congress for years past, and I am prepared to defend it now and in the future. I believe it is thoroughly consistent with these ideas that, instead of saying that there shall be no railroads where otherwise they might be stopped by a reservation, we declare that in case the reservation is one made by mere executive order, which is frequently changed, there shall be no right of way without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, but if it is guaranteed by treaty then they shall come to Congress, and we will stand here to see to it that the Indians shall have fair play when leave is asked to cross their boundary.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator from Nevada sees in the distance some object which it is desirable for him to obtain, but between him and that object there lies an Indian reservation, and he cannot reach that point unless he triumphs over the rights of those men who occupy that reservation. I remember, when I was a farmer, a neighbor who occupied a homestead, and within a distance of a mile or two he had another tract of land, but it was not very accessible to him, because a neighbor owned land which intervened between his two tracts. He wanted to reach the farther tract, and he could not without great inconvenience, unless he could go across the farm of his neighbor. He had just as much right to cross that land to suit his own convenience, to accomplish his own selfish purposes, as we have to authorize five natural persons to cross an Indian reservation for the sake of reaching a point which is desirable for a railroad company.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would suggest to my honorable friend from California that he should provide in his amendment for compensation; that if the consent of Congress is granted, it shall be in all instances upon compensation.

Mr. SARGENT. I think that is a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to hear that amendment read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize any railroad company to enter any Indian reservation or have the right of way over the same without the written permission of the Secretary of the Interior; and where such reservation is set apart by treaty, the consent of Congress shall first be obtained, and compensation made to the Indians for any injury caused thereby.

Mr. MORTON. There are two kinds of Indian reservations, as I understand; one kind created by a treaty with the Indians, that is a contract; and the other kind is an arbitrary one created by the Secretary of the Interior and not by treaty. This amendment provides that a railroad company may enter upon an Indian reservation created by treaty, under the authority of an act of Congress. A treaty, I suppose, implies two parties to it: the Government on the one side, and the Indians on the other; but this amendment provides that one of the parties to this treaty may abrogate it in part and may enter upon the territory without the consent of the other. Now, sir, if it is a treaty at all, if it is a contract at all, there ought to be the consent of both parties. If you allow one party to do this without the consent of the other it is no treaty; it is a mere sham. You call it a treaty when it suits your purpose; but you trample on the rights of the Indian when it suits your purpose. The idea of damages in such a case is absurd. How can you estimate the damage to the Indians in running across their territory? That is a trifle; but entering upon their territory without their consent is an exasperation which sometimes produces war, causes murders. The Indians regard it as a violation of their rights; they do acts of violence; and we make those acts of violence an excuse for war on our part or for taking their territory from them and shoving them off further west or further south. You run a railroad across their territory without their consent. It may not do them any pecuniary injury that is appreciable; the damages amount to nothing; but they know it is a violation of their rights; it excites them, and they know of no remedy but violence. They cannot resort to a court. Then when you begin to construct your road across their territory you take hundreds or thousands of hands, build up little villages here and there, and the first thing they know, that reservation, which they thought was set apart to them exclusively for all time, becomes inhabited by white people, carrying with them their vices, their whisky-shops, and all those things.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me a word? We have abolished the making of treaties with Indians, and Congress is the only party now dealing with this question, and Congress has undertaken to deal fairly between the Indians and the Government and the people; and it is the only tribunal now recognized by the law. Formerly if you wanted to carry out that idea, it would be by a treaty, but now it is by act of Congress.

Mr. MORTON. You have abolished all treaties for the future; but have you abolished all treaties in the past?

Mr. STEWART. But Congress has not acted in any way to violate the treaties.

Mr. MORTON. Here you are providing, and the amendment recognizes the fact, that there are reservations now held by treaty, and you propose to authorize one party without the consent of the other to invade that reservation. That is simply the strong hand; there is no good faith; there is no honesty about that.

Mr. SARGENT. Will not that argument apply when application is made in any specific case to cross a reservation? It cannot be done without the consent of Congress; and when consent is asked, all these arguments will be good in any given case when you are called on to give that consent.

Mr. MORTON. I supposed it carried out the idea that the consent of Congress is enough without consulting the Indians. It simply gives authority without consulting the Indians at all.

Mr. SARGENT. Not without the consent of Congress.

Mr. MORTON. Of course with the consent of Congress; but that is only one party.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it assumed that Congress will consent improvidently?

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to ask one question. Treaties being left out of the question?

Mr. MORTON. That is in the future.

Mr. STEWART. Well, Congress has declared by an act that no more Indian treaties shall be made. You cannot do this by treaty; you cannot get across the reservation by treaty. How are you going to arrange to get across it at all unless by act of Congress?

Mr. RAMSEY. The Secretary of the Interior may be directed to negotiate with the tribe for that purpose.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment certainly carries with it the idea—and that is the purpose of it—that if Congress consents to the invasion of a reservation created by solemn treaty with an Indian tribe, that is enough without consulting the Indians at all, perhaps in absolute hostility to their wishes. You do that; and the first thing you know you have an Indian war on hand which will cost the Government millions; murders are committed; and it is these acts of violence and this disregard of the rights of the Indians that have given rise to a great many of the hostilities that have taken place.

Mr. President, the Indians are by the Constitution regarded as people with whom treaties may be made. The Constitution so recognizes them. We have made such treaties. We call them solemn contracts; and when the Indians violate them, we hold them responsible. If an Indian is found off his reservation, the first thing you know the military power of the Government is invoked to drive him back to the reservation; but when you go on to his reservation in violation of the treaty, it is all right. That is the difference. We hear every day almost that some Indian tribe has got off its reservation hunting, or for some other purpose, perhaps driven by starvation, and then the troops are sent out to drive them back on to their reservation, and we make their violation of it an excuse for depriving them of their property; but on the other hand we go on their reservation without consulting them, and it is all right. That is the difference. I do not care anything about this except as a matter of principle.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, is it so that the Government of the United States in making its treaties with Indian tribes has so tied its hands that it cannot for all time to come make a public highway through an Indian reservation? If that is so, then the Indians are a much more greatly favored class of people than I had supposed. I always knew they were aristocrats of the highest order. Some of the tribes are the richest people upon the face of the earth. They do not work; they are not called upon to work; they are furnished with vast hunting-parks—that is all they amount to—for them to roam over and hunt in. There is no inducement given to them to work, because the annuities paid to them by this Government render labor unnecessary. I say that if we have so tied our hands in the past that we cannot under any circumstances without the consent of the Indians project a public highway through one of these reservations, I think it is time for us to consider whether there is not some higher law that will sweep out of the way this obstacle to civilization; for what greater evidence of civilization can we have than that afforded by a public highway which is of the very highest character known as a railway?

Mr. PRATT. I should like to ask my friend from Arkansas what step the Government would take to extinguish the right of an Indian tribe in a reservation secured to it by a treaty between the United States and that tribe? Would they think it necessary to purchase that reservation from the tribe, or would they take it without their leave or consent?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the right of way—and that is all that is required—over any Indian reservation without paying just compensation therefor; and I apprehend a way can be devised by which and through which just compensation can be paid for the right of way across a reservation. Why, Mr. President, my farm can be taken for that purpose, and I have even seen the sacred precincts of a grave-yard entered by a corporation, graves removed by a corporation, and this done lawfully and legally. We do not presume, at least I suppose no one presumes, that if you take the lands of the Indians for this highway you will do it without paying them for them. If you do, I cannot vote for that.

Mr. STEWART. Any way in the world so that we can get across them.

Mr. CLAYTON. You cannot tunnel a reservation very well, I suppose; you cannot go over it through the air unless you invent a balloon or something of that kind to do it with.

Mr. STEWART. My proposition is simply this: if there is any way in America by which a sage-brush reservation occupied principally by lizzards and rabbits can be crossed legally and properly in order to get to the settlement beyond by a railroad, put it in this bill; I care not how it is done.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think there is a way; and I think that way does not violate any treaty, either. It seems to be assumed in this discussion that a white man cannot put his foot upon an Indian reservation. If that is so, I should like to see the provision in the treaty. He cannot settle upon the reservation, he cannot go there and make it his home and take his family there; but I never have yet seen a reservation that a white man could not travel across with his family if he chose; and it is a strange thing if you can have no public highway upon an Indian reservation except the Indian trail that crosses it. I should be glad to see the day when these Indian trails will assume the higher character of highways; I should be glad to see railroads take their places; and it seems to me that some way certainly can be devised whereby this can be done, and without outraging the Indian any more than you would outrage me if you should allow a railroad to pass through my farm, or tear my house down, or pass through a grave-yard where my father's bones lie buried.

Mr. President, as this question is up, since we have entered upon it, I think it is very necessary for us to determine just what the United States can do. I never supposed that this Government had so completely tied its hands that at a future time, no matter how small in number these Indians may become, as long as there is one Indian on a reservation, you cannot cross it. All the rest of a tribe or band may have passed away and died off but that one Indian, and he must be consulted before you can cross his reservation, it seems. I hope that is not so. I hope the lawyers in this body will ascertain that there is some way under the Constitution and without violating any treaty obligation whereby we may be able to cross these barriers that stand in the way of civilization.

Mr. MORTON. I was going to say, in reply to my friend's proposition, I did not have that matter in my mind when I spoke, that the general intercourse law does prohibit white people from going upon Indian reservations, and that the treaties are based upon this law.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does it prohibit them from traveling across the reservations? I know it prohibits them from settling upon them.

Several SENATORS. Entering upon.

Mr. INGALLS. As I understand, it is a uniform provision in all Indian treaties that no white person shall be allowed to go upon any Indian reservation unless he is in the employment of the United States or has the consent of the superintendent of Indian affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say to my honorable friend that the idea upon which we have treated the Indian has been that the presence of the Indian and our people was in utter incompatibility; that he could not live with white people; he was a heathen; he was a man of such peculiarities and idiosyncrasies of character that his presence was an utter incompatibility with the progress of civilization; and hence all these American communities from the beginning have adopted the policy of expulsion; he must live outside of our jurisdiction, the jurisdiction of our laws, and the amenities of civilized societies. Now, what do we say to him? "If you will go out and take a place by yourselves and occupy a territory by yourselves, no white man shall intrude his presence upon you, unless he is officially authorized by the authority of the Government of the United States." That is the theory. I only say that, not to answer the Senator's argument, or by way of argument upon the proposition at all, or by way of comment; but that is the general fact which underlies all our policy, first, one of expulsion; and accordingly, from Plymouth Rock to the Pacific, these tribes, one after another, have been expelled by force on that idea until they have crossed the Mississippi, and they are fading out, and we are doing the best we can with our poor relations, the heathen.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, in dealing with this Indian question we have been compelled to change even the meaning of words in the language. We use a word called "treaty" to signify our dealings with these tribes; and yet that word "treaty," judged by the use made of it, has no more resemblance in fact to the word "treaty" implying the connections or contracts made between this Government and foreign powers than light has to darkness. Would we consider that our national dignity or honor would allow us to make a treaty with a foreign power whereby we should pay year after year tribute to that foreign power? Would it not be considered a stain on our national honor? And yet, in what we call a treaty, we do this for the Indians. I read from the last one ever made. We provide:

For fourth of thirty installments, to purchase clothing for males over fourteen years of age; for flannel, hose, and calico and for domestics required for females over twelve years of age; and for such flannel and cotton goods as may be needed to make suits for boys and girls, $159,400.

How would that look in a "treaty" in which we were dealing with a foreign power?

Here is another:

For the last of four installments for purchase of beef, flour, bacon, and sugar in proportionate quantities for twenty thousand persons, under the tenth article of the treaty of April 29, 1868, and subsistence of Yankton Sioux, $1,314,000.

A treaty by which we were to pay a million and a half for four years, or any other length of time, to some foreign power to feed its people, as a condition of what? As a condition that they should keep peace with us; that they would not rob and murder our people and carry desolation along our frontiers! The term "treaty" is a misnomer when used in that connection.

Again, did any civilized nation ever treat with a power within its own limits recognizing territorial jurisdiction and sovereignty? Is not that a solecism—an imperium in imperio, an independent nation within the boundaries of the United States; and yet we have got to assume that this is existing in the treaty-making power. The fact is that from circumstances we take a term of defined, understood meaning, and apply it to something foreign to its original meaning. I admit that there are some contracts which may have been made with these tribes which give them certain rights, and I am in favor of maintaining them; but when you say on account of those contracts we lose all power given by the Constitution of the United States over the Territories to make rules and regulations to dispose of our property there, then I say you carry the argument too far.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power to make rules and regulations for the disposition of the territory and other property of the United States. Can we by contract made with an Indian tribe, or call it a treaty, if you please, abrogate that congressional power? My amendment proposes to remit this question to Congress, in order that the rights of the Indians may be observed; and I ask Senators whether that is not constitutional, and if the other theory is constitutional, that we have given consent by some legislative act which takes away our powers under the Constitution of the United States?

Now another question. You say that these are treaties. Would it be consistent with our duty to consider a treaty subsisting between us and a foreign nation which was all the time making war upon us, which we had to surround with a cordon of troops, or with armed vessels, in order to keep them on their own territory, and from coming out and robbing or murdering our people? And yet is not this the normal condition of the Indians, with few exceptions? They do not maintain peace. We imprison them on these reservations ourselves, and keep them there to prevent them from perpetrating outrages. Does the Senator from Indiana think that for years past every or any treaty made with the Indians has been kept by them? The other day we heard from Red Cloud as about to retake the war-path, which he had promised to abandon, and been paid to abandon. He was followed and coaxed by our agents, and finally concluded that he would not carry out the aggression which he started to commit. I use this as a simple illustration. He and his braves are no better or worse than others. Scarce a month passes but some of these treaty tribes have made war on us, murdered our soldiers and citizens, and yet we say these treaties with them are sacred and inviolable! I tell you it will not do to analyze this thing too closely and bring it down to a question of national faith. National faith and obligation must be reciprocal or it is chimerical.

The Constitution gives us jurisdiction over this matter, as I have shown; but I believe it is better to feed the Indians than fight them. I believe it is better to be humane toward them than to be barbarous. I think we should show our superior civilization in that. We can put up even with the wrongs and the injuries they have inflicted upon us, and endeavor if we can to procure the peace and quietness of our settlements by any means; bribe them by presents of cattle and agricultural implements, and by sending articles of use and luxury to them, to induce them to desist from the war-path and let the scalps of our people alone. I would do it from policy, not from obligation. I am certainly in favor of doing it, and the amendment I offer is entirely in that spirit; and I again call attention to the fact that here is the most ample provision for the protection of all the rights of the Indians, while devolving upon Congress the right to legislate in this matter conferred by the Constitution of the United States. Here is the amendment, to which I again call attention:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize any railroad company to enter upon any Indian reservation or have the right of way over the same, without the written permission of the Secretary of the Interior; and where such reservation is set apart by treaty the consent of Congress shall first be obtained, and compensation made to the Indians for any injury caused thereby.

If that is not humane, if it is not just, if it is transcending our powers, it has not been pointed out in this debate. But furthermore, any treaty made either with Indians or any foreign power can be abrogated by act of Congress, we taking the consequences. It is not a question of national faith unless there is a limit of time, and even that is absolved by the consequences accepted of war. The Constitution does not say the treaties are the supreme law of the land. It says the treaties and laws of Congress are supreme laws, and one is as high as the other. By a well-understood law of construction that which is last on the statute-book, whether treaty or law, repeals that which went before if inconsistent therewith, and is supreme; but even that argument is not necessary to the amendment I offer.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] is so manifestly proper to my mind that I had hoped the Senator from Nevada would accept it. As a member of the committee it did not occur to me when the bill was under consideration, or I would have proposed it myself. Anybody who knows anything about the Indian character understands very well that when their reservations are entered by a railroad company, with all its demoralizing influences, the attachés that follow, such an enterprise breeds discontent, disorder, and finally the result would be to break up the reservations and scatter the Indians upon the plains to depredate upon the frontiers of the country for all time afterward.

It is not a question of power. Undoubtedly the Government of the United States has power to invade all these Indian reservations and to despoil the Indians of all it has promised to them. It has done so again and again, or suffered the people of this country to do so; but that is no argument. Nobody questions the argument of the Senator from Nevada and of the Senator from California about the power of the Government, but it is a matter of good faith on the part of the Government. Beyond that, it is a matter of expediency, a matter of policy, on the part of the Government, since it has undertaken to settle these Indians upon reservations and feed them rather than fight them. Then why not pursue that policy? What is the object in collecting Indians together at a great expense, and putting them on reservations, and under agents, if then you are to invade them and break them up year after year? That would be the fate of every Indian reservation that any of these railroad companies pass through, I undertake to say; and there can be no question about it, I think.

Mr. President, I dislike very much to hear the arguments that have been made here this morning, because they are all in the same strain. They all mean this much, and nothing more, that the Indians are to go away wherever it is the interest of the frontier people to push their settlements. That has been the history of the Indians from almost the beginning of settlements in this country. They have been crowded from one section of the country to another less and less valuable, until they have got at last upon almost the last portion of the country where they can make a subsistence at all, even with the help of the Government. And now everybody can see on all sides, in the public press and the speeches that are made here, and the memorials to Congress, that we are preparing to invade the Indian Territory proper and to despoil them of the possessions which the Government has not given them by any means, but which the Government has sold them and guaranteed to them. They are to be driven from their possessions before five years from to-day, according to the way things are drifting, in my opinion; and I for one protest, and shall protest hereafter as long as I have any voice in this matter, against the spoliation of the Indians. They may have been ill-treated, as the Senator from Nevada says, by the agents of the Government, and I do not doubt that they have been very much abused by the agents of the Government; but that is no argument why the Government should abuse them in addition. On the contrary, it is an argument why the Government should stand up for their protection, not only against its agents, but against those who want to despoil them of their rights.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I have heard some strange doctrines on the subject of Indian rights on this floor to-day, and I have heard for the first time that our fathers, from the beginning of this Government down to the year 1868, were either fools or impostors in assuming that it was necessary to make treaties with Indian tribes for the purpose of extinguishing their rights in the territory which they occupied. Now, sir, our statute-books are full of these treaties—they are numbered by hundreds—in which the United States, the party of the one part, have agreed with the Miami Nation of Indians, of the other part, for example, that in consideration of such a sum of money to be paid, or in consideration of such a reservation to be made, or both, the tribe cedes to the United States a large body of valuable lands. This, sir, is called a treaty. It has got all the elements of a treaty, and it has got all the formalities of the treaties that we enter into with foreign powers; and the faith of the United States is pledged to their observance; and this state of things has been going on from the formation of this Government down to nearly the present time, and nobody was wise enough to suppose that the Government of the United States could acquire the property of the Indians without negotiating and paying for them.

Sir, were our fathers all wrong in this? Is it true that the Indians had no rights which the Government was bound to respect? I am not particular whether you call these treaties or whether you call them simply contracts; but I know there were two parties to them. I know that the United States was party of the one part and entered into certain stipulations and covenants, and among other things, as has been shown here by references this morning to various treaties, they covenanted with the tribes of Indians that they should hold, use, and occupy exclusively their reservations without the right of any white man to enter except by the consent of the superintendent or by the authority of the Government.

Sir, are those words all meaningless? Are we, simply because we have got the power, to trample under foot our own solemn obligations? Would we dare to do it with any European nation that had the spirit and the power to punish us? No one will pretend it for a moment; and yet what but this does the amendment of the Senator from California contemplate? The argument of my colleague has not been answered, and cannot be. The amendment assumes in its very terms that these corporations may acquire the right of way through a reservation belonging to a tribe of Indians without their consent, provided only the Secretary of the Interior or the Congress of the United States, both being agents of one party and not of the other, shall consent. Now, if my friend from California had only gone a step further and added, "without the consent of the tribe that owns the reservation," he would have been entirely right, and I could cheerfully have voted for his amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I undertake to say——

Mr. PRATT. I will bring what I have to say to a close in a moment more.

Mr. STEWART. I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana declines to be interrupted.

Mr. PRATT. O, no; I will hear the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. I undertake to say there is not in one of the Territories, leaving out the Indian Territory, a tribe of Indians that anybody pretends undertakes to keep any treaty stipulations at all. There is no treaty with the Indians that is regarded at all; there is no contract between them and us which anybody pretends that they regard. You cannot name one tribe in one of the Territories where the Indians pretend to keep a treaty. You simply buy the Indians from year to year to do certain things, and they do not regard these treaties.

Mr. PRATT. Does the Government regard them?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; the Government of the United States does regard them; the whites regard them; but the Indians do not regard them in any way. You treat with them by making temporary bargains from day to day. There is no treaty that the Indians know what it is or care anything about. You cannot name a treaty that is kept outside of the Indian Territory. I defy anybody to do it. I defy any one to name the tribe. Nineteen-twentieths of all your arrangements are made with nobody at all, made where there was not an Indian, made without having any Indians at all. In my own State men have attempted to make treaties, and they would bring their census of Indians and an investigation would go on, and we would find that there were no Indians there as represented by them. Go and talk with the Indians, the chiefs there who work and are getting on well, taking care of themselves, and out in that State you will find they were misrepresented in their attempts to make treaties. There is not a treaty that anybody knows anything about except the white people outside of the Indian Territory; and it is a sham and a fraud to speak of them and compare them with Great Britain, or a treaty with a foreign nation. It is very easy to make a mark like a cross to a piece of paper; but who knows the signature? Who has verified it? I defy you to name a tribe that has got a reservation outside the Indian Territory that the tribe knows anything about a treaty.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to interrupt his flow of words by asking whether——

Mr. STEWART. I would rather have a flow of words with sense than a flow of eloquence without sense and without truth, based upon nothing.

Mr. PRATT. I have really forgotten what I was going to say when interrupted by the Senator from Nevada. I was about asking him whether during his stay in this body he has ever passed upon any treaty negotiated by the United States with a tribe of Indians; whether he has ever, as a Senator of the United States, solemnly given his consent to a treaty to which the party on one side was a tribe or nation of Indians who thereby conveyed away their lands?

Mr. STEWART. Let me answer that question. When I first came into the Senate I had lived in the Indian country about twenty years; we were making treaties, and it struck me as the weakest thing I ever heard of; and I want to give my friend my experience.

Mr. PRATT. I have not got through yet.

Mr. STEWART. Let me answer the question. I will give my experience. I want to illustrate it. There were a lot of Indian treaties pending. Toward the close of the day we went into executive session, so that we should not, for fear of the great contracting parties, betray state secrets; and all the Senators left except the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Vice-President. I staid to see what was going on. They put through several treaties, and I commenced reading them here, and I thought that they had some very peculiar provisions in them; and one of the treaties that was then under consideration to which I called attention—I finally called for the yeas and nays and broke the thing up——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator should be called to order for revealing what took place in executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator is out of order.

Mr. STEWART. There is one treaty I——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator has no business to reveal what occurs in executive session.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon.

Mr. CONKLING. We can go into executive session for the Senator's accommodation, and then he can tell us about it.

Mr. STEWART. One of the treaties passed on that occasion which I can mention is one on which a $2,000,000 claim was based and attempted to be forced through here; I refer to the Choctaw claim. It was based on that treaty, and that called my attention to it. The fact that such a swindle as that could slip through under such circumstances called my attention to this treaty business, and I commenced investigating it; and being from that country and seeing who were the contracting powers, I came to the conclusion that there was nothing in these treaties; that they were gotten up here in Washington and not with the Indians at all, and I commenced fighting Indian treaties. I say, leaving out the Indian Territory, there are no treaties that the Indians pretend to respect or know what they are. There is no tribe sufficiently intelligent to know what its treaty is, if it has a treaty. A treaty is put upon it by the whites without its knowledge. It is a mere sham. As Congress has now abolished the principle of making treaties and proposes to legislate, this amendment of the Senator from California provides that we shall get through the Indian reservations in the ordinary way by legislation.

Mr. PRATT. Now I will conclude in a moment or two more if not further interrupted. The Senator tells us that nobody has ever respected these treaties; that they ought not to be respected. Sir, the United States have respected them so far as to hold fast to every rood of land acquired from the Indians by these treaties. You do not propose to give up the State of Indiana, or the State of Mississippi, or the State of Alabama, all of whose territories have been ceded from time to time by tribes of Indians. No, sir; you hold fast to all you have got.

One other point right here. Does the Senator intend to put a stamp of fraud upon all the commissioners that the Government has sent out from time to time, good men, trusted men, for the purpose of negotiating these treaties with the Indians? He has done so in the very arraignment which he has made this morning of the treaties which they have negotiated, which have been reported to the Senate of the United States, and which the Senate sitting in solemn council has confirmed, sometimes carefully amending them, and resubmitting them to the Indians to obtain their consent.

Mr. STEWART rose.

Mr. PRATT. I decline to be interrupted. I will be through in a moment more.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion, the point which I wish to make, and the only point I cared about making when I rose was, that if these tribes have any rights at all in their reservations they have them in the entire reservation; that if you cannot without fair purchase or by treaty extinguish those rights in the entire reservations, you cannot extinguish them in any part of the reservations, and that is precisely what you clothe these corporations with power to do. This is all I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MORTON. According to the argument of the Senator from Nevada, in the first place there are no Indians.

Mr. STEWART. There is not one in ten——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. There is not one-tenth of the number you pay for.

Mr. MORTON. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. I say there is only about one in ten.

Mr. MORTON. In the first place, he says there are no Indians to treat with; and, in the second place, the treaties are all made by the white people, and they are forced on the Indians. In the next place, nobody pretends to keep a treaty on either side. The argument of the Senator from California a little while ago, as I understood him, was that it was preposterous to talk about dealing with these Indian tribes as if they were foreign nations. In other words, it is competent for us to make treaties with other people, and it is proper for us to violate them because they have not sufficient dignity on their part to require us to observe our own contracts.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the gentleman think that a fair statement?

Mr. MORTON. It is that kind of morality that has produced one-half of the Indian wars.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the gentleman state that as an honest construction of my argument?

Mr. MORTON. I think I have stated the fair intendment of the Senator's argument.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I have nothing to say.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator said we could not regard these tribes as foreign nations. We do regard them as foreign nations so far as making treaties with them is concerned; but we do not regard them as foreign nations in keeping those treaties. That is the difference.

Mr. SARGENT. We have kept them as much as they have.

Mr. MORTON. We make treaties with them; we treat them as foreign nations; we get their property on the faith of those treaties; but when it comes to the observation of these treaties we treat them as powerless and helpless and run over them, and have done it from the beginning. That is the occasion of one-half of the Indian wars. The trouble is that we make treaties; the Indians believe we are bound by them; we set them off certain territory; we tell them that territory belongs to them; they have sense enough to understand it. When the Senator from Nevada says they do not understand these treaties he is entirely mistaken. When you give a tribe a reservation and put them on it, they do understand it.

Mr. STEWART. Name the tribe that understands it?

Mr. MORTON. Let me get through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield and should not be interrupted.

Mr. MORTON. And when white men go on the reservation without their consent, it makes them angry, it exasperates them; they commit deeds of violence; and forthwith dispatches are sent to the Government of the United States that the Indians are making war. That is the way these troubles begin more than half the time. The Indians know their rights are violated, and it is this kind of morality that says, "They have no rights; we can trample upon them from time to time." That is the cause of nearly all our Indian wars.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to put a question.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield the whole argument if an Indian tribe in a Territory can be pointed out having a treaty which the Indian tribe knows anything about or cares anything about. If any gentleman will name such a tribe, outside of the Indian Terrritory proper, I will give up the argument.

Mr. MORTON. I think that is a strange statement on the part of my friend. He has just found out that no Indian tribe ever keeps a treaty, and he says they never understand their treaties, and every administration down to the last administration has been treating with the Indians; all kinds of commissioners and agents have been employed; some of them perhaps were scoundrels, but many of them men of integrity and men of sense, and they thought they were making treaties with actual existing tribes of Indians; but he has found out that they were all mistaken. The Senator from Nevada has found out what nobody else ever did. That is the substance of it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there is a good deal said about my position that there is not an Indian tribe in any one of the Territories covered by this bill that has a treaty which it regards, or keeps, or knows anything about. My statement is broad, I know. If there is such an Indian tribe, I do not know it. I have lived in that country twenty-five years, and do not believe there is such a thing. I know there are Indians of intelligence in the Indian Territory; but outside of that I do not think there is an Indian tribe that has a treaty that the Indian tribe knows anything about. I would not for that reason do anything to injure an Indian. I believe that I am as much for the protection and care of the Indian and have as much humanity for him and a great deal more than many people who want to use the Indians for purposes of gain. I believe these treaties, except with a few of the more civilized tribes, are entirely a sham. I do not believe they would have been made as a general thing by any of the Senators here. I think there is hardly a Senator here who would have made them. I admit that the Sioux—and there will be no railroads built near them under this bill for many years to come—have got some treaties; but the Sioux tribe do not pay any attention to the treaties but make further demands each year, and we are called on every year to make appropriations to appease them. You are making appropriations now ever year to make new arrangements with them. The United States is constantly buying them off, making temporary arrangements with Red Cloud and the rest of them to keep the peace for the time being. They have no treaties that they regard as of any consequence whatever. But when you go off the great plains and take all the Territories west of the east base of the Rocky Mountains, there is no Indian tribe that has a treaty that knows anything whatever of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you say to those treaties that were made by General Sherman and his associates?

Mr. STEWART. They were made with the Sioux.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With a dozen different tribes.

Mr. STEWART. All Sioux on the plains.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you propose to do about the Sioux reservations? Do you propose to riddle them with railroads?

Mr. STEWART. I propose to leave that to Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what we propose to do; not to grant the authority.

Mr. STEWART. Not to grant authority unless Congress shall do it hereafter. The amendment of the Senator from California covers that case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Adopting this covers it.

Mr. STEWART. No; adopting this says you will not allow them to go through at all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wonder that the Senator from Nevada does not accept the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, because it is perfectly clear that this amendment must be in his bill or we do violate a treaty, because we have expressly stipulated, whether it was rational or irrational, that no white person should go upon these reservations. The effect of adopting this amendment is not that which the Senator says, to prevent a railroad from ever crossing these territories. He has his bill for all the Territories of the United States with the exception of the Indian Territory. How will that work? If a corporation wants a road across Indian territory they will select a place where they can cross that territory doing the least injury to the Indians and the least injury to the United States. They will get the consent of the Indians; they will come to Congress, and Congress will look at the question to see whether that involves the necessity of getting another reservation for these Indians, and if it does, they will not grant it; but if the Indians consent to it and there is no breach of faith and it does not injure the reservation, then they will grant it, and they ought not to do it under any other circumstances. My friend from Nevada had better just accept the amendment. He cannot do better.

Mr. OGLESBY. What is the question pending, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOWE in the chair.) On the amendment moved by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] to the first section of the amendment of the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. OGLESBY. As I understand this matter, it strikes me that I cannot support the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. The first section of this bill provides:

> That any number of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory.

The pending amendment adds this language: "And Indian reservations in the Territories." I do not feel disposed to cast a vote here, or to assist in creating a congressional construction, upon an Indian treaty or upon the rights of Indians in an Indian reservation set aside to them by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior under an agreement with a body of representative Indians of any one tribe. I do not feel like giving a vote in this body which recognizes the right in the Indians on such accidental reservation to prevent in all times the construction of a public highway across their territory. When the original treaties were made between the fathers of the Republic and the Indian tribes, public highways in the sense of railways never entered into their contemplation; and we, patterning after the old forms of Indian treaties, have gone along from one year to another, losing sight of the idea that railroads might be constructed under the authority of Congress through its own territory. Therefore those provisions have not been formally made in Indian treaties. Reservations of the right of constructing railroads across Indian lands have formed no formal part of these Indian agreements, Indian contracts, Indian treaties, Indian understandings. Now the question is raised in this body, and raised to-day by the amendment pending on this territorial railroad bill, whether we shall admit, without qualification, without limitation, without reservation, the absolute right of the Indians on a reservation, in any portion of the United States Territories, to prohibit the construction of a railway through that Territory. I am unwilling, by an act of Congress, to give that construction to any understanding with the Indians occupying any Indian reservation at this hour.

The Government of the United States has ever regarded itself as holding the ultimate and final title to every foot of Indian territory in the nation. We have always held that they had no right to sell to a foreign nation; that they had no right to treat with foreign nations. It was nothing but an assumption of power on our part, and yet we have uniformly adhered to the doctrine that the Indian tribes should never cede their territory, which they held alone by occupancy, to foreign nations, or to individuals, or to any power but the United States.

Now for the first time it is formally proposed here, by the amendment pending, to confer upon a band or a fraction of a band of Indians, or a tribe or a fraction of a tribe of Indians, who may have a reservation in the direct line of commerce, in the direct line of trade, right on the pathway of the public highways of the country, the right to prevent a railroad, under the authority of the United States, being constructed across their territory without their absolute consent. I am disposed to recognize the rights of the Indians in the Territories under existing treaty stipulations. I think I would be as far as any Senator here from entertaining a disposition to wantonly violate any rights they have; but I do maintain, and I hope the Senate will maintain, that it was not the purpose, in setting aside these reservations, to confer upon the Indians the right to interdict the Government in laying out public highways.

Now, look at the laws of our State Legislatures, look at the laws of Congress on the subject; take the very words of this act: If there be persons who have private property, if there be citizens who own real estate in their own right, farmers in a State or a Territory, or the owners of private land in a State or Territory, this bill, as all railroad bills, provides how you may proceed in court to extinguish the title and confer on the corporation the right to cross it; but when you strike an Indian tribe which has a reservation, what happens? There are no land-owners in the reservation; no Indian in the reservation owns a foot of land; there is no private claim there to be liquidated or extinguished; the whole tribe claim that they own the reservation, and unless the whole tribe shall consent, though the right of way may be ever so desirable, you must either go around the reservation, go out of the direct line, or the project must be abandoned unless the Indians will agree to accept compensation and permit the road to go across their reservation. Suppose the Indian tribe decline to give you a right of way; suppose they decline to let a public corporation in a Territory run its road over the reservation; suppose they decline to give their consent to Congress; then, gentlemen, how do you propose to cross over? I know perfectly well what you will do; I know a means will be found, either directly through the Government acting honorably, or indirectly through private individuals, to cross over that Indian reservation. I want to avoid that catastrophe. I do not want to recognize in a formal law of Congress here now deliberately at this late day of the world the right of an Indian tribe to say that a road shall not be constructed across its territory. By the language of the amendment, I think it is meant for that purpose. You leave it then entirely at the option of a wild tribe of Indians, who may be greatly incensed against the corporation or greatly incensed against the white people to such an extent as to prohibit the enterprise entirely. I cannot vote for this unqualified amendment which leaves to the entire control of an Indian tribe in a reservation the right to prohibit the construction of a railway across it.

Why, sir, there is not a State in this Union to-day that has the power to prevent it. There is not a civilized man to-day in a State owning a foot of land that can stand in the way of the Government of a State or of the nation in the construction of a public highway. Will you in these wild territories clothe a barbarous tribe of Indians with power that no American citizen has to-day, to say that a highway shall not pass over the land? Well, but you say that the corporation must go and contract with them—get their consent. Suppose they will not give their consent? Take the question as it is presented to you. Suppose they decline to give their consent; you are then, gentlemen, by this amendment conferring on them a power which you do not allow to a State of this Union; and I protest that it is not a proper amendment to ingraft on this bill. I would not put such unlimited powers in any State in the Union; much less would I clothe a wild Indian tribe with them.

Mr. President, the Indians of the United States have rights. The public sentiment of this country will respect them. I doubt not there are individuals in the Republic who transgress those rights, who have transgressed them, and who, I doubt not, will continue to transgress them. Neither you nor I, nor the nation, nor an act of Congress can prevent it; but I do not want now here deliberately to vote for an amendment which says to the Indians on these reservations which they casually occupy, or occupy under a treaty, under a covenant with the Government, that they may stop the car of progress. I do not want to commit myself to an act of Congress that in after-life will give me or somebody else great trouble to get around. All the Indian nation has to do is to refuse consent, to refuse purchase, to refuse consideration money. If the title in the reservation were in the individual Indian, then it might be extinguished; but the title is not in any head of a family; the title is in no individual Indian; we have fixed the title, if they have any at all, in the tribe, and you must therefore have the consent and the concurrence of the whole tribe before you can pass through with your public highway. I believe it was never the intention of the Government in any treaty that it ever made, and I think it cannot be the purpose of the Government now to clothe an Indian nation—I do not care how solemn the treaties are—with the right to interdict the construction of public highways by the authority of the Government across a Territory. I believe it would be unwise to now ingraft such an amendment upon this bill if it shall become a law; and with these views I feel that I cannot vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut in the language in which it now stands.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] misunderstands the proposed amendment, or else I misunderstand it. It does not confer any additional power upon the Indians, no matter where they reside. It does not say that they may at their own discretion interpose and prevent the construction of a railroad through their reservation. Nothing of the kind. The bill proposes that any five natural persons may go to certain places and there construct a railroad. My amendment proposes to restrict them and say they shall not go upon Indian reservations in the Territories, and that is all. There is no additional power conferred upon any set of men by the proposition which I have presented. On the contrary, instead of conferring power, it is simply reiterating the declaration on the part of the Congress of the United States that it will not use the power which it may possibly possess to deprive the Indians of those rights which the nation has guaranteed to them.

But the honorable Senator suggests that here are men wild and savage who will stand in the way of all improvement, and that it will not do for this Government to stand still and allow any obstruction to the car of progress and improvement. Sir, if this Government wants a railroad through any section of this country I have no doubt it will find a way to secure it when the public necessity demands it; and if it is to go through an Indian territory, it appears to me that it can be secured in the way pointed out so briefly and so clearly by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN;] that no Senator should dissent from that way. I do not believe that we should expect justice unless we deal justly, especially with those who are feeble and dependent upon us; and it does not appear to me that we can suffer any man or set of men to trespass upon the territory which we have set apart and consecrated to the Indian and for his benefit, and interfere with the rights and privileges which we have guaranteed.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, when this bill was first taken up by the Senate I had very grave apprehensions as to its correctness. Its discussion, instead of diminishing, has increased those apprehensions. I have no wish to make the motion that I shall make in this case unless a vote can be taken at once on this amendment and the bill hurried to a final disposition. The bill was taken up, I am very well satisfied, without the Senate's really understanding what it involved, and the consequence has been that we have expended three days that might have been employed very profitably on the Calendar, as I humbly think, and in the discussion of a bill that in my judgment cannot now pass the Senate. I only rose for the purpose of saying that unless this vote is taken at once and unless steps shall be taken by those having the bill in charge to at least speed its disposition, if I can get the floor again I shall move to lay it upon the table and thus get rid of it.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to occupy a single moment in reply to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] I merely wish to say to the honorable Senator from Illinois that I think he is mistaken in the view that he takes of this amendment. He says we are declaring that these Indians have rights in the reservations which we have no possible power to dispossess them of. That is a mistake. We only provide by this amendment of the Senator from Connecticut an exception as to the grant of a power to certain persons who may form a corporation. The substance of the bill is that any five people may form a corporation for certain purposes and may take lands. Now we say "we will not grant you this unlimited power; we will not confer this privilege upon you as it respects a certain part of the domain of the United States which we have set apart by an arrangement with some wild Indians for another purpose." Now adopting this amendment, I submit to my honorable friend, only leaves it exactly where it is now; and any corporation that wishes to go through a reservation must then apply to the President of the United States under this act to rearrange a treaty or a protocol with the Indians, to make some bargain with them by which they assent if it is right it should be done, or refuse, or if the President should be unwilling to do it, then to come to Congress, when the question would be raised that my friend suggests of what the paramount powers of the nation may be in taking any part of its domain for public use, whether it be occupied under State sovereignty or by an Indian under a treaty.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to make a proposition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No. If my friend from Nevada will let me finish I shall soon be done. Therefore, Mr. President, I submit in all seriousness to my friend from Illinois that the question that he opens does not arise on this amendment. We only say to these general corporators to whom we grant a general privilege, "We will not now give you in advance a privilege to do this thing; we do not grant it." Then it leaves it just as it was before. We do not say the Indians may not be invaded; we do not say that we have not the power to invade their country; we do not say that this right of eminent domain does not exist; we only say that where we have set apart territory for hunting purposes for wild tribes, that shall not be invaded by people to whom we are granting a privilege, until we shall know hereafter, or until the President and the Senate shall know hereafter, that that invasion is one which we can properly assent to when we know all the circumstances. The question that my friend has argued, I submit to him respectfully, does not arise.

Mr. STEWART. I simply want to make a proposition to my friend from Illinois and my friend from Vermont. After what has been suggested by the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Vermont, I am satisfied to take the bill with this amendment, even if we are not allowed to build across Indian reservations. It will diminish the number of private bills that will come here and will allow some railroads to be built. I propose to abandon the opposition to the amendment, and let it be adopted. We shall have something of the bill left then, and it will diminish to some extent the great evil of private legislation.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I am not disposed to misunderstand the meaning of the amendment. If it be susceptible of the interpretation put upon it by the honorable Senator from Vermont, it would relieve the objection I have against it. It does not strike me, however, that he entirely exonerates the amendment from just criticism, if not objection. This is a bill; it is an act of Congress, in case it becomes a law, conferring upon a certain number of persons the right to construct and operate a railroad through the Territories of the United States. I take it that Congress in conferring this power on its citizens to form corporations under this general law, is proceeding deliberately, for a sensible and wise and just purpose, in the exercise of a constitutional power. It is a deliberate act of legislation. Now what do we say? "That any number of natural persons not less than five may become a body-corporate for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory," and the amendment adds "and except Indian reservations in the Territories." Is not that a specific and direct exception in a law framed for a general purpose, to construct highways in the Territories, and to deliberately except the Indian reservations means something more than to say they are not included; that they are bound by nothing and we are bound by nothing when the act shall become a law? It seems to me that it is an acknowledgment by the national Congress of rights in the Indians on these reservations that were never intended by any treaty to be conferred upon them. I do not believe it is the spirit of the existing treaties with the Indians on these reservations. I believe it was never contemplated in any treaty or any contract with them in placing them on the reservations that they should thereby attain pollitical sovereign rights over the territories of the Government. We do not confer the title upon them. It is simply a right of occupation. That is all they possess. They are to occupy the Territory for the purpose of civilization and to prevent war, to get them in a smaller compass, that we may manage them more efficiently and with less detriment to themselves or to ourselves.

Now, when you shall have gone beyond that general purpose and in an act of Congress excepted the Indian reservations in the Territories, what do you mean by the exception? What will the Indians on the reservations understand by it, if they can understand it at all? I differ with the Senator from Nevada in one essential respect. I do think that the Indians have a very keen perception of their rights under every treaty we have ever made with them. I think they understand all they get by every treaty that has ever been made with them, and I think they are disposed to insist upon a technical and strict construction of the treaties. They are uneducated, it is true, in one sense of the word, but many of them are men of great learning, if you may use the word "learning" as ascribed to men who never have been to school, but who have been educated under the discipline of a severe experience. I say they do understand their rights, and it will be explained to them by the Indian agents or the friends of the Indian agents; and in less than twenty-four days after the passage of this law it will be made plain to them that their rights and their territories were purposely excepted from this act, and their understanding will be at once that it was the purpose of Congress not to invade their territory without their consent and authority. They may never give that consent. An Indian tribe on a reservation may never give it. I take an extreme view, I grant you, but still I take a proper view of the effect of passing a law here of the character of this one. I do not wish to put the Government on a false ground any further with the Indian tribes. I hope the day will come when the General Government will act candidly and fairly and plainly with the Indian, and tell him, what fate already tells him, and what we ought to have the candor to confess to ourselves, that the present tribes of Indians on our western prairies and plains have but two destinies before them—one of certain and unavoidable extermination, or the other of elevation to American citizenship.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute which I hope the Senator from Connecticut will accept.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed substitute will be read.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is to be inserted at the end of section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall take any land belonging to any Indian reservation without the consent of the tribe occupying said reservation, or without making just compensation therefor to be ascertained in such manner as Congress may direct.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to vote for this bill; but I am free to confess that if the Senator from Nevada by accepting the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut shall make that amendment a part of this bill, I cannot vote for it. I cannot commit myself to the doctrine that the United States cannot under any circumstances authorize the establishment of a highway through an Indian reservation. As has been said so aptly by the Senator from Illinois, let it go among the Indians themselves that this Government cannot project through an Indian reservation a public highway for the use of citizens of the United States through its own territory—and certainly these Indian reservations are a part of the territory of the United States and under the constitutional provision it is within the power of Congress to make necessary regulations for the government of that territory—and the consequences will be very detrimental. To adopt the principle that we have not this power, would be to adopt a very false principle.

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to my friend from Arkansas to let us have as much as we can get. I am satisfied we cannot pass the bill without the amendment.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment uses the word "or" where it means "and," I think.

Mr. CLAYTON. I meant "or"—either one or the other. If they get the consent of the Indian tribe, then it is not necessary to come to Congress. But if the Senator prefers it, I will put in the word "and," so as to read:

Provided, That no corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall take any land belonging to any Indian reservation without the consent of the tribe occupying said reservation, and without paying a just compensation therefor to be ascertained in such manner as Congress may direct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut accept this as a substitute for his amendment?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not accept it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if the amendment provides that the company proposing to build a road through a Territory where it necessarily runs across an Indian reservation must obtain the consent of the tribe and also make compensation?

Mr. CLAYTON. Pay a just compensation. The amendment as I at first drew it was that they should either obtain the consent of the tribe or make just compensation to be ascertained in such manner as Congress might direct.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that was right.

Mr. CLAYTON. It seems to me that in any case they should pay just compensation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And in any case they have got to get consent.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; that is not my understanding. If it is capable of that understanding, I shall have to change it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is it, and it is much more obnoxious to the argument made than the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. STEWART. Let us take this amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think I had better leave the amendment as I at first drew it with the word "or" instead of "and."

Mr. SARGENT. I simply wish to say that I think it would be very injurious to turn the Indian tribes over to discuss these matters with these corporations or to let the corporations loose on the Indian tribes with the requirement that they shall obtain the consent of the Indian, legalizing their endeavors to get that consent; for they with their sharpness may take advantage of the simplicity of the Indians. There is no guardian of the Indians to see that they are not imposed on. Certainly the amendment will not do in that shape. If there is any consent to be got it should be by agents of the Government acting impartially, and not the agents of corporations. It seems to me the amendment will not do at all. I infinitely prefer that of the Senator from Connecticut, which remands the whole question to Congress; and I do not know but that that is the best solution of the matter. I think the proposition I made provides for some contingencies and lays down some general rules which Congress would be willing to act upon, but I am not strenuous in reference to it. I am very well satisfied that it will not do to tell these corporations, "Go and make your own bargains with Indian tribes." They will introduce whisky and all sorts of mean influences in order to get their consent. I think it would be impossible for us then to control the Indian tribes; and it might lead to Indian wars on account of the bad influences we should bring directly in contact with these tribes. Now, we will not let anybody treat with them but agents of the Government, and we find that that is wise policy; but if you say these corporations may get their consent, they will use any means to get consent—it may be by bribing some of the head chiefs; it may be by intoxication; it may be by improper influences of various kinds. I do not think we ought to let any such influences loose on the Indians.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand that the Senator from Connecticut does not accept my amendment. Therefore I presume it is out of order to offer it at this time, as it comes in at another part of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition of the Senator from Arkansas is withdrawn; and the question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask that it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert after the word "Territory," in the sixth line of the first section, the words "and Indian reservations in the Territories."

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. I do not think there will be any opposition to the amendment. Let us adopt it by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays will be considered withdrawn if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I withdraw the amendment which I have pending to the eighth section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment moved by the Senator from California is withdrawn.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to propose an amendment in the eighth section, and I understand it will be acceptable to the friends of the bill. I am a friend of the bill myself. It is the section that provides for the right to the road to take from adjacent public lands along the line material of "earth, stone, timber, and water necessary for the construction and maintenance thereof." I wish to strike out the words "and maintenance." I think if they remain in for all time the companies might have the right to take off adjoining land that which would be necessary to keep their road in repair forever. I would grant a road newly building the right to take material therefor, but not for maintenance and repair. I therefore move to strike out the words "and maintenance;" so as to read:

Authority is hereby given to such corporation to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material of earth, stone, timber, and water necessary for the construction thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

That any charter herein granted shall be revocable by the Legislature of any State which may hereafter be formed out of any Territory or Territories of the United States and organized and admitted into the Union as a State, within whose limits any such railroad shall in whole or in part be found to exist, and shall in all respects be subject to the laws of such State.

Mr. STEWART. I think if it was simply made subject to the laws of the State it would be better.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware by a clause giving Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal this charter whenever, in their opinion, the public good requires it.

Mr. STEWART. That is in the provision now.

Mr. WADLEIGH. And also embracing the idea of the Senator from Delaware as to placing the roads in the power of the States when they are erected. I send my amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act; and whenever the Territories, or any part thereof, in which the said railroad is located, shall be admitted into the Union as States, the Legislatures of said States may at any time add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act so far as relates to such railroad or any part thereof which shall be within the territory of said State.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire seems to be preferable to mine. Mine was intended simply to provide for that power of revocation which by the constitutions of the several States is now retained by them in all these matters of corporate charter; but his provides, I think more wisely, that it shall extend during the period of territorial condition of the State to the United States, and after that shall have passed the power shall be vested in the several States which may be formed out of these Territories. I therefore would prefer that his amendment be moved as a substitute for mine.

Mr. STEWART. You will accept it?

Mr. BAYARD. I accept it in lieu of mine, withdrawing the one I offered.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to suggest that it shall come in on page 30, ninth line, in lieu of the provision:

Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of such corporations, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Let it come in in place of that clause, striking that out.

Mr. WADLEIGH. That was my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware waives his amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, to strike out part of line 9 and lines 10 and 11 on page 30, and insert what has been reported.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that, because in my judgment the clause in the tenth line, "having due regard for the rights of such corporations," will prevent Congress from doing anything which it could not do without the last clause of the section if that was not in. That is, Congress may at any time alter, or repeal, and amend the charter of a corporation created by it, unless that amendment or that repeal affects the rights of the corporation. If the provision for a repeal or amendment be in the charter it cannot affect their rights. Now, in my judgment, the clause "having due regard for the rights of such corporations" would have a legal effect to prevent Congress from making any amendment to the charter which affected the rights of the corporations and would deprive the last clause of the section of its legal force. My amendment gives to Congress the same rights which the Legislatures of nearly all the States now, I think, retain in the charters granted by them for corporations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. In line 3 of section 1 I move to insert after the word "persons" the words "citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be residents in the Territory where such railroad shall be proposed to be built;" so that it will read:

That any number of natural persons, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be residents in the Territory in which the railroad is proposed to be built, not less than five, may become a body-corporate, for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad in the Territories of the United States, except the Indian Territory and Indian reservations in the Territories, and the District of Columbia, with all the rights, privileges, and powers conferred by, and subject to all the restrictions of, this act.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to my friend from Delaware that that would not work very well, because, in the first place, a road might go through several Territories and the corporation could not get a majority even in each Territory; and another thing, the people of the Territories would want to invite people elsewhere in the United States to invest. I have no objection to saying that they shall be citizens of the United States, but anybody should have a right to go into the Territories and build a railroad. If the right be confined exclusively to residents, I think it would embarrass the making of railroads very much. I am willing to have it accommodated so that it will please everybody, but I think to require a majority to be residents of the Territories would be too much.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether the scope of this bill is such as to allow any five persons, without regard to residence in the United States anywhere, to file their certificate of intention to build a railroad from the western boundary of Dakota to the Pacific Ocean, and that on this general description there would be ample power to create such a corporation to build through all the Territories?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly. What hurt would it do if they did build through the Territories?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I simply made the inquiry.

Mr. STEWART. If they organize to build a road they can build any length they please, but they must build so much each year in order to make that franchise good, and it does not exclude anybody else from building too.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How much must they build?

Mr. STEWART. They must grade ten miles each year, and have the road completed in ten years.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They must grade, but not operate?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not operate any. Then, Mr. President, it occurs to me, I would suggest to my friend that on this supposition, by so broad a power, you commence, say, at the western boundary of Dakota, and you file a certificate, running by general direction—I suppose no more specific direction, perhaps, is practicable—but by giving simply the direction which you run through certain counties, naming the counties, you can run to the Pacific coast; and by filing that certificate of such intention you may secure the right to build a road through all the Territories, having the right of way one hundred feet on each side.

Mr. STEWART. Fifty feet on each side.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No matter; but you secure that right, and the nominal duty the company has to perform is to grade ten miles a year.

Mr. STEWART. Will that do any harm? Suppose that could all be done. In the first place, the certificate is filed; in the next place, the right of way is only acquired by building the road. They have no privileges until they build the road, and where and as they build the road; and if they go through a defile they have got to divide the right of way with any other company. They merely can go on and claim their right and build the road in ten years; but the fact that they have got the right does not exclude anybody else from doing the same thing. Another company can be organized without coming to Congress, as was the law heretofore. It makes all the difference in the world where you have got to come to Congress to get the charter. But the mere fact that they claim the right of way to go to the Pacific Ocean does not affect anybody in the world. They get no right, no privilege, no right of way until they build, and when they get there it is not exclusive; somebody else can build alongside of them. It is the mere privilege of building which this bill gives.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I had paid no attention to this bill until to-day my notice was attracted by an amendment affecting the rights of the Indians, a subject to which my attention has been called on several occasions before. My attention is now for the first time called to the initiatory section of this bill. It provides a general incorporation law by which any five persons may create a corporation to run a railroad across all the Territories of the United States, starting, for example, on the western border of Minnesota, running through Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington Territory.

It is competent for Congress undoubtedly to charter a company for that purpose, and it appears to me that so great a franchise as that should not be conceded to anybody unless it be done by the deliberate judgment of Congress. Besides that, it confounds all territorial distinctions. The Territories are hereafter to become States; and the practice heretofore has been to give to the Territory that authority which afterward became the power of the State, so that each State and Territory had its own railroad system; but under this law five men can incorporate a company to run clear across all the Territories.

The Senator from Nevada says this is not an exclusive privilege. In one sense it is an exclusive privilege, because where one company comes in and incorporates and lays out a line of railroad, that has the effect to prevent other parties from doing the same thing. A second company will not be incorporated to build a road alongside of the line projected by the first company. I had supposed that this was intended to confer upon each territorial Legislature the power to charter railroad companies within the limits of that Territory. I should favor such a bill as that, to allow each territorial Legislature to exercise the same powers, subject to being overruled by Congress, that each State Legislature has in regard to its territory. Let us suppose, a great many persons believe, that Congress has the power to charter railroads in the States—a power that has never been exercised; but I will take it for granted that Congress has that power. What would be thought of a general act of incorporation allowing five persons to create a company to build a railroad to run from Washington to the city of Indianapolis or Saint Louis, without consulting the States through which it passes, and without consulting Congress? That is the precise power that is to be given, so far as the Territories are concerned, enabling a company to become a corporation to construct a road fifteen hundred miles in length, and that is to be an existing corporation when those Territories come in as States. One amendment proposes to authorize the States when they are created to repeal the charter, but that would not be right, because a State occupying a midway position might repeal this extended charter. Suppose, if you please, that Montana becomes a State and Montana then repeals the charter so far as Montana is concerned and cuts the road in two in the middle; that would not be right. No such power as that ought to be conferred. Where a railroad is to be run beyond the limits of one Territory into another, or clear across all the Territories, should not that railroad be chartered by Congress? Should there be a general law that authorizes anybody, any speculator, to come in and incorporate a road and then sell out the charter; because that has been a business in this country. It has been a business in States in the West to procure charters from Legislatures or to incorporate under general laws and get the start of other people, and then sell out.

I believe, Mr. President, that I shall feel constrained to vote against this bill entirely. It inaugurates a new system; creates a general law under which five men—they may not even be American citizens—they may not one of them be a resident of any of these Territories—five mere adventurers and speculators without capital, may come in and incorporate a railroad running across three or four Territories fifteen hundred miles in length without regard to the wishes or the convenience of the Territories. It will not do to say that it does not prevent other people from doing the same thing. It does, because where a railroad is once located other persons will not come in and build along the same line. The first line may never be built or may not be built for many years, whereas the local convenience of the Territory is broken up and destroyed. It seems to me, Mr. President, too great a power, and it is an innovation. I should very much prefer to authorize each territorial Legislature to charter railroad companies in its own Territory subject to the revision of Congress, and if a company acting in good faith want to build a railroad across two or three Territories, let them come to Congress, for it is of enough importance to get a charter from Congress.

Mr. STEWART. Leaving it to the Territories has been tried and Congress in 1867 abolished that plan, seven years ago. Coming to Congress men get a special charter without consideration which blocks up the passes. We want a free railroad bill. That is all I want to say about it.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I have listened a good deal and hesitated whether I should submit any remarks upon this subject, but indeed it appears to me that it is my duty. I shall feel better after it, I think. I am familiar to some extent with a large area of the frontier country. I am familiar with Texas, and the process by which that country has been peopled. I went to Texas at an early day. We have about two hundred and seventy-five million acres of land there, and a new-comer to the country, as the immigrant was termed, from time to time would make his appearance. He would go to some leading man in the neighborhood and ask for public lands. A man was entitled in the first settlements there to a league or more; subsequently it was reduced to thirds of leagues, twelve hundred and eighty acres, six hundred and forty acres, and down finally I believe in 1842, or 1843 perhaps, to three hundred and twenty acres for heads of families. There were shrewd men that at first emigrated to that country, as there will be in all those vast regions now known as the Territories of the United States. Those men who were first there, when persons would move to the country seeking homes honestly, with the inducements that had been held out to them to do so, would seek over the country information to know where a good tract could be procured. The shrewd men there before them almost invariably had all these fine selections secured; and how were they secured? It was termed there by the wise ones that they had them lariated out. They were filed upon, to use the term, and a very proper one, too, by filing the certificates of head rights, bounty warrants, and all that sort of thing—they would file upon them, and when a man would come into the country they would show him the land; a league, one-third of a league, twelve hundred and eighty acres, six hundred and forty acres, or three hundred and twenty acres, as the case might be, and sell it to him. They would say, "This is my location, but I will float; I will take up my certificate and sell this for five hundred or a thousand dollars," whatever the party visiting found himself able to pay, when the land in the first instance was not owned by the party selling it.

Now, it seems to me that I can see that state of things precisely in this contemplated bill. What is this bill? It purports, as has been before reiterated here—the language is clear—that any five men going in and forming an association can commence building railroads broadcast through this mighty domain. To ascertain the privilege they are precisely in the condition of the men in Texas at an early day who had the lands lariated out. Then they must sell to substantial men who go in and desire to build railroads. They can then have an opportunity to prey upon them; they can sell to them. This bill is simply anticipating and reaching too far, in my humble opinion. It is crossing the river before you get to it. It is unnecessary to do so, and in many instances very objectionable. If there were five individuals to-day asking for a charter, there is no man here more ready than I would be to give it to them, and I would be gratified to know that they were in reality intending to construct a railroad through some one of these Territories; but I want to know them. I want to know A, B, C, D, E, &c., as to whether they are responsible; I want to know the friends that can vouch for them, or whether they be men of straw. We have gone through that thing in Texas. For twenty-five years large tracts of country have been set apart for railroad enterprises, but those men who originally procured them never built any roads; and this is simply re-enacting that same system and carrying it out in the vast Territories of the United States, and it will substantially be in the way at some day of good, practical, and able men doing and performing that which they will desire to do. Then it will be sufficient to grant these charters. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," or for the benefits that may be derived in this particular bill as contemplated. There is too much of it. It begins anywhere, and ends likewise. The privilege to be taken is too vast. We do not know whether it is Montana or what other Territory or what individuals. These Mennonites of whom we hear may come in now. There is a proposition to give them not more than half a million acres, I believe, in one instance. Whenever they come they may designate that they are going to build a road thus and so. Then we are giving up these rights to people from all countries on God Almighty's earth. I am not opposed to their coming; I want to invite all who will be good citizens; but when they come and ask for substantial aid and privileges, it will be time enough to give them to them. I do not want to make any such bid; it is not wholesome; it is vicious, in my opinion, and I am opposed to it.

There is so much anxiety to close up this matter and consummate it that I will not continue the remarks that I could very readily make on the subject. I think it an impolitic thing. Whenever it is found necessary for men to come here and ask charters, it will be found that they will be accorded to them instantly and there will be no hesitancy; but this thing of anticipating and permitting them to lariat out these lands, as they will just as certain as water runs down stream, I am opposed to. Man has done it and he will continue to do it. Men will take the map and look to the various points there, and will run a line directly from one to the other, and they will appropriate those lines as far as they can, and whenever they shall have introduced a few teams of oxen and thrown up a little embankment, leveling the land a little in those beautiful prairies, they will have a location there, and their representatives in Congress in due time will come here and show that there was some cholera or something that came along so that they could not exactly come up to time, but their intentions were good, and ultimately they will certainly do the thing, and if they cannot they will sell out to those who can; and thus it goes on interminably. I am opposed to the whole policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. STEWART. I would suggest to the Senator from Delaware that he ought to modify his amendment. It should be "Territories" instead of "Territory."

Mr. BAYARD. Let the word "Territory" in the amendment be in the plural.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as modified.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to have it reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed after the word "five," in line 3 of section 1, to insert:

Citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be residents of the Territory in which the railroad is to be built.

So as to read:

Any number of natural persons not less than five, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be residents, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Delaware, as a mere matter of phraseology, to drop the words "natural persons," and let it read that "five citizens of the United States." "Natural persons" is rather on odd phrase.

Mr. BAYARD. That is in the original bill and not in my amendment. That is the language of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. But let the Senator strike out those words and insert his words, "that five citizens of the United States, and of one or other of these Territories," not of one Territory necessarily.

Mr. BAYARD. I am perfectly willing to include in my amendment a motion to strike out "natural persons" and insert the words I have proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. STEWART. Let the amendment be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended, the section will read:

That five citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be residents in the Territories in which the railroad is proposed to be built, may become a body-corporate, &c.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to suggest to the Senator from Delaware that he had better say "in the Territory or Territories."

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. As modified it reads:

That five citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be residents in any Territory or Territories in which the railroad is to be built, may become a body-corporate, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. In section 2, line 11, after the word "road," I propose to insert the words "which shall not be less than $10,000 per mile;" so that the clause if amended will read:

Thirdly, the amount of capital stock necessary to construct such road, which shall not be less than $10,000 per mile, which amount so specified shall not be increased without the consent of Congress.

There is a requirement that of the subscription 10 per cent. shall be paid in actually in cash; and in order to ascertain what that shall mean, the number of shares of the company must be stated, and the value of capital stock per mile of road. Ten thousand dollars is a minimum for such construction.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Let us have a few moments more.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. I think we can get a vote in a few moments.

Mr. CAMERON. If I thought we could have a vote I would give way.

Mr. STEWART. Give us ten minutes more and we shall get through. I do not think there will be more discussion.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not want to make a bargain, but if the Senator from Nevada will not say another word on the subject I will withdraw the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to my friend to wait a few moments.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It has been suggested to me by my friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] that in the amendment offered by me there were one or two verbal errors which might render it susceptible of two constructions. For the purpose of obviating those objections I desire to move to reconsider the vote whereby that amendment was adopted, and I propose when that is done to substitute in place of it a slightly changed form of words.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read and then we can do it by unanimous consent.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that, by common consent, this be substituted for the amendment adopted on my motion:

That Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act; and whenever any Territory, or part thereof, in which the said railroad is located, shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the Legislature of any such State may at any time add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act so far as relates to such railroad, or any part thereof, which shall be within the territory of said State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment in this form will be substituted for the original amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to say a word to the Senate upon the amendment now offered, before it is accepted.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator from New York allow me to submit my motion?

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will allow me to enjoy the floor I will promise not to exceed one minute in my occupation of it. It is a very odd commentary just now upon our legislation to adopt such an amendment as that. Congress exerting its power charters a railroad, although by general act, through a Territory. We are providing that by and by when statehood is conferred upon that Territory the Territory or a piece of it may paralyze and annul entirely the action of Congress. And that when we have a bill before the Senate, which has been adopted in the other House, which asserts virtually the right of Congress over railways in the States, although built by States while they were States. It is a long transition from that doctrine to the notion that we should provide, having confessedly the right to make all individual rules and regulations for the Territories, that the railroad being built under act of Congress, when hereafter, fifty years hence if you please, a Territory comes to be a State, then that Territory or a piece of it may step in and strike down this railroad altogether. I do not wish to occupy any time, nor do I resist the adoption of the amendment; but I simply call the attention of the Senate to the oddity of this legislation.

Mr. CAMERON. It is evident now that we shall not get through with this bill to-day, and I therefore renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session yet. Let us see if we cannot pass this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not rise to debate it; but I do rise to ask the indulgence of my friend from Pennsylvania and of the Senate to take up before we go into executive session a bill that will not occupy two minutes. If the Senator will give way to me, I will state the reason why.

Mr. CAMERON. I yield.

BRIG HATTIE EATON.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate Committee on Commerce have this morning reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the British brig Hattie Eaton. That brig is now loaded at the wharves in Boston. The committee have unanimously reported in favor of giving that register and the vessel is now held up for want of it. I ask that it be passed.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register or enrollment to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton; which brig was repaired in an American port, and became the property of an American citizen in payment of the expense of the repairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 10, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CURRENCY.

Mr. RICE. I present for reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency a series of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, on the subject of the currency.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RICE. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

Preamble and resolutions adopted on 'Change by the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago on the 7th day of April, 1874:

Whereas it is contemplated by the present Congress to provide for further issues of irredeemable currency when that currency is already so plenty that it is worth but about eighty-eight cents on the dollar, thereby opening the door for the next Congress to declare any issue made by the present Congress inadequate, and therefore order a further issue of fifty to five hundred millions more: Therefore,

Resolved, That we protest against the proposed measure to inflate and further debase the currency, deeming any currency too plenty that is not worth one hundred cents upon the dollar in gold.

And further resolved, That instead of debasing the currency Congress should take measures to make good the promises of the Government to pay and provide for the redemption of a currency already too redundant, thereby carrying out its plighted faith with its creditors and establishing the credit of the United States upon the high plane of honor to which it is entitled.

Resolved, That we call upon the President to use the power and prevent the carrying into effect of any measures that will tend to delay or render at all doubtful a gradual but certain return to specie payments.

Resolved, That the secretary be requested to hand these resolutions to the press for publication, and also forward copies to our representatives in Congress and to the President.

A copy of the records of the board.

CHS. RANDOLPH,
Secretary.

CHICAGO, April 7, 1874.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 2885) to remove the disabilities of David A. Telfair, of North Carolina, and Charles H. McBlair, of Maryland; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the House voting therefor.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2473) to repeal so much of the laws relating to the organization of the Army of the United States as establishes distinctions to the prejudice of colored American citizens; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD FROM THE MISSOURI RIVER TO THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

Mr. HOUGTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2886) amendatory of an act supplemental to the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

PREVENTION OF CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2887) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful to bring any vessel or vehicle coming from a foreign port or country and affected with a contagious or infectious disease or conveying persons, merchandise, or animals affected with contagious or infectious diseases, into any port of the United States, except under the regulations hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service, are hereby constituted, ex officio, a board to make the regulations to be observed by persons controlling vessels or vehicles coming from foreign ports or countries into ports of the United States, by passengers upon and persons connected with vessels or vehicles so coming, and by pilots at the several ports of entry, to the end that no persons, animals, or goods affected with infectious or contagious diseases may enter the United States. And said board may prescribe the times, manner, and places of performing quarantine by vessels, vehicles, persons, animals, and goods coming from foreign ports or countries, and may make all needful rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, and alter and amend the same, for the efficient execution of the purposes of this act; but no rule or regulation or amendment to the same shall have effect until approved by the President. The board shall organize within thirty days after the passage of this act and establish the rules and officers for its own government.

SEC. 3. That there shall be detailed or assigned by the President, from among the commissioned medical officers of either the Army or the Navy, or from among the surgeons of the marine-hospital service of the Treasury Department, to be selected without regard to rank, but solely with reference to skill and experience in hygiene and public sanitary science, one who shall be the secretary to the above board, and shall, in addition, under the direction of the board, be charged with the supervision of all matters pertaining to the establishment and maintenance of the system of quarantine provided by this act.

SEC. 4. That for the execution of the duties arising out of this act any medical officer of the Army or of the Navy, or any surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the Treasury Department, may be detailed or assigned, according to the exigencies of the service, with especial regard to economy and efficiency; but no person in the employment of the Government, detailed or assigned to duty under the provisions of this act, shall receive any additional compensation therefor. And the President of the United States shall issue such instructions to the officers of the various Departments of the Government, not interfering with their peculiar duties, as shall secure the aid and co-operation necessary to perfecting and enforcing the regulations provided for by this act.

SEC. 5. That any person violating the provisions of the first section of this act shall, upon conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, at the discretion of the court; and the circuit courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment and maintenance by States or municipalities of health regulations and quarantine measures in addition to, or in furtherance of, and not conflicting with, the system constituted by this act, and such local system and its appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CREAMER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas the dimensions of foreign immigration to the United States have made it a matter of national importance and concern; and whereas the commissioners of immigration at the port of New York have, by their recent action, ignored the rights of the German Emigrant and Irish Emigrant Societies, by depriving said societies of the power heretofore possessed by them to render protection and assistance to their countrymen on their arrival in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be empowered to investigate the question of foreign immigration, and that said committee report to this House a bill embracing such regulations and requirements as will render protection and aid to all immigrants landing on our shores.

SILOMA DECK.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING SPEECHES ON THE CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to withdraw my objection to gentlemen printing their speeches on the currency question. I understand that several gentlemen who were promised the floor were, in consequence of the pressure of the business of the House, unable to obtain it.

PRINTING OF REPORT.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented a report in writing to accompany bill H. R. No. 2795; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

USE OF HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the petition of John Beeson and others, asking for the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives for a meeting in behalf of the Indians, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPLANATION IN RELATION TO THE CITY OF PETERSBURGH, VIRGINIA.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to occupy five minutes in an explanation not personal to myself.

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I send to the desk and ask to have read a portion of an editorial which appeared in the New York Tribune of yesterday, and to which my attention was called by a letter from the editor of one of the leading papers of this country.

The Clerk read as follows:

Quack remedies for misgovernment.—The city of Petersburgh, Virginia, is in a bad plight. The municipal government has been for several years in the hands of the designing and corrupt leaders of ignorant men, and has been administered for the sole purpose of insuring to those in office the continued support of the lowest class in the community. The result is that the once busy streets of the city have become grass-grown and almost deserted; business is on a steady decline; active men seek other fields of labor; northern capital finds its way to Richmond, Norfolk, and Lynchburgh rather than to Petersburgh; the only immigration is from the rural districts, whence shiftless negroes come to find in Petersburgh a home of idleness, and to feed upon the droppings from the public crib. In their despair the tax-payers appealed to the Legislature of the State for relief. It was given in the form of a new charter, designed to place the municipal government in the hands of intelligent and respectable men. But the measure of relief had a fatal defect, in that it deprived the people of the right to choose their own officers. The appointing power was given to a board of commissioners who were to be the creatures of the Legislature. Fortunately Governor Kemper had the pluck to veto the charter at the risk of losing the support of the party by whose suffrages he had been elected. For this action he was violently assaulted in public and in private by some who had been his most cherished political friends. He was accused of radicalism and of all else that is offensive to the old-fashioned Virginian. It was charged on the floor of the Legislature and by the press that the veto was the result of a corrupt bargain between Grant and Kemper, by which the State was to be turned over to the republican party. In Petersburgh the governor was branded as a traitor and an infuriated crowd burned him in effigy. But a reaction soon came. The sober second thought of the senate sustained the veto; the press returned to a sense of duty; and to-day Petersburgh alone, of all Virginia constituencies, continues to abuse a governor who defied his party to do right.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I now desire, in as public a manner as possible, to call the attention of this House and of the country to this and like statements which have been made in regard to the city of Petersburgh; which have been made and reiterated in various parts of the country, since public attention was directed to it by Governor Kemper's recent veto of the charter for the new government of that city.

I wish to state, and I do it on my personal responsibility and my personal knowledge, that every single statement in that paragraph is false from beginning to end. There is not a particle of truth in one of those statements. I assert that the city of Petersburgh to-day, under republican centrol, is the model municipal government of the southern cities. Since the republicans got control of that city in 1870 they have largely reduced the debt of the city. They have reduced the taxation from $1.80 in the hundred dollars to $1.40. They have established and maintained in successful operation the best system of common-school education in the South, as Mr. Sears, secretary of the Peabody board of trustees, shows in two of his annual reports.

They have put the public property of the city in a magnificent condition. They have built fine iron bridges over the Appomattox River in place of old, rotten wooden structures. Not one dollar has been lost or claimed to be lost by maladministration on the part of the republican officials during the past six years. These are facts that ought to go to the country. They are true.

Now let me briefly state why and how the city of Petersburgh is embarrassed in its financial affairs.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is this in the nature of a personal explanation?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. It is because I had a great deal to do with and was personally connected with the city government of Petersburgh.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not see that there is anything personal in what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I did not state that it was a personal explanation, but asked permission to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The House gave the gentleman five minutes to make an explanation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope I shall not be interrupted. I want to say that under democratic administration of the city government there was only one depository of public money in the city of Petersburgh, the Merchants' National Bank. The only change made by the republican city government was to name the People's Savings-Bank with the Merchants' National Bank as depositories for public funds. Now, when the Merchants' National Bank, which was entirely controlled by democrats, and with the management of which no republican ever had anything to do, failed last year, the money belonging to the city government of Petersburgh was to a large extent on deposit in that bank, and they only got a very small dividend on that money, while every dollar on deposit in the republican bank, the People's Savings-Bank, has been saved to the city and has assisted it greatly in making its payments during the past six months.

Now, in what the Tribune says of Governor Kemper's act in vetoing the city charter of Petersburgh, I most entirely agree. That charter provided that the judge of the hustings court of Petersburgh, who is a democrat and was elected by a democratic Legislature, should appoint a commission of five citizens to govern the city, and they were to appoint the officers of the city except the mayor. The mayor was almost the only officer who was to be elected by the people, and he was shorn of all powers. This was proposed to be done by the democratic party in reference to a city which has six hundred republican majority. It was that act of the Legislature of Virginia, to his eternal honor be it spoken, that General Kemper, the present governor, did himself the honor to veto.

Now, I have made this statement in justice to the city of Petersburgh and in order to nail this lie to the counter in as public a manner as it can possibly be done. The city has northern creditors who have invested in its bonds, which are as valuable to-day and sell as high in the markets of the country as those of any city in the South. Under republican administration its obligations have been promptly met and will continue to be honestly provided for. There is not one candid citizen of the city to-day, be he republican or democrat, who does not know that all the embarrassments now so severely felt by its business men were caused solely and entirely by the bankruptcy of the Merchants' National Bank last September, and not in any sense by any maladministration or misgovernment by its republican city government. Previous to the failure of this bank the republican council had provided ample means to meet every liability and every current expense for this fiscal year on the part of the city, and Petersburgh was in a condition of financial ease never exceeded in its history. Unfortunately, the greater portion of the funds so provided were in this bank which failed so disastrously; but the city's credit is unimpaired, and every citizen is determined that it shall be maintained. Though no longer a citizen of Petersburgh, I am intimately associated in sympathy and interest with its people, and I protest against statements such as the one to which I have called attention being circulated to the great injury of the credit of the city and the interest of its business men. I trust the Tribune will correct its statements which it has been unintentionally no doubt misled in making. I thank the House for its indulgence.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; and the same were referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 2164) for the relief of T. W. Dexter; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1803) for the relief of Charles B. Roberts.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the regular order of business.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing for a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, was postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to withdraw the motion to lay on the table. I do it for the purpose of stating to the House the reasons for postponement, and I will detain the House but a moment.

Mr. MAYNARD. Can the motion to lay on the table be withdrawn except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that either the motion to reconsider or the motion to lay on the table can be withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. If the motion to lay on the table be withdrawn, is the motion to reconsider debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is debatable within narrow limits. The merits of the bill are not open to discussion.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the Chair decide that the question is debatable?

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone was a debatable question and of course the motion to reconsider is debatable; but both within narrow limits and the same limits. The merits of the bill are not under discussion on a motion to postpone.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope something may be allowed to be said in reply.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am not going to say anything that will need any reply.

Mr. HYNES. I call attention to the fact that in the RECORD the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is reported as simply a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That is not a correct report. The motion was to reconsider and lay on the table.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not wish to interfere with this particular motion one way or the other, for I do not care anything about it; but it is a very important question for this House whether after any vote has passed the Chair will give the floor for a motion to reconsider that vote and for debate without first allowing a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table to be tested by the House. It is contrary to the practice of the House, so far as I know, and it will interpose after every vote we take an opportunity for renewing debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that his point would be good if it applied to any other member than the one making the motion. But the member making the motion is, of course, the one most interested in pushing it to a conclusion. The Chair has never known an instance in which a motion to reconsider has not been allowed to be made, and to be debated if the person making it chose so to do.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is what I desire to be informed about.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair had given an opportunity to another gentleman to make the motion to reconsider than the one making the motion to postpone, that would have been in derogation of the rights of the person submitting the motion which was approved by the House. The motion to postpone under the rules of the House is debatable within very narrow limits, which limits of course must apply to the motion to reconsider. And the Chair will endeavor to keep the gentleman from Massachusetts within those limits.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair will have no difficulty in that respect. I do not think there is now any occasion at all to debate the merits of the bill. I will only give my reason for moving to postpone its further consideration until Tuesday next, which I hope will govern the House. It is not on account of any desire to antagonize the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is for the purpose of giving those who believe that the currency of the country needs that relief which a large majority of the House seem to think it does need, an opportunity to extend that relief and thereby satisfy the demands of the country, so far as relief is afforded in the bill which the Senate has passed, and which is now upon the Speaker's table.

If that shall be done, then I hope that on Tuesday next the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MAYNARD] will go on and perfect his bill, and the House will aid him in the direction in which it provides. I desire also that some amendments shall be made to that bill, and that is a reason why I antagonized the previous question, but with no intention of antagonizing the committee. If by parliamentary usage I have any further right upon the subject, I will freely surrender to that committee, which it seems to me has labored with great diligence and with a desire to relieve the industries of the country.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts this question: There are many of us from the West exceedingly desirous to pass some measure for free banking and it is reported that the gentleman is opposed to such a law. I desire to ask the gentleman if we support his motion and take up and pass the Senate bill will he then favor that portion of the committee's bill which provides for free banking?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am in favor of some provision for free banking, if we are to continue our system of banking at all, but not in the precise terms of the bill of the committee. I have before said that I am in favor of free banking, if that is the best thing that can be got in the way of relieving the dearth of the currency. I do not mean to antagonize the principle of the bill of the committee in that respect.

I desire to go to the Speaker's table and take up the Senate bill and pass it, and thereby assure the country that so much relief is certain, and thus to assure them what in my judgment will be certain from public considerations, that the Executive will not veto a bill which legalizes his action. I want to do this so that the spring business of the country may go on while the Senate and the House are ascertaining what further measures of relief are necessary. Therefore, if the motion to postpone is sustained, as soon as the morning hour is over, under proper parliamentary rules I propose to move to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the Senate bill and passing it without amendment, not as the best thing that can be done, not as a thing which I by any means fully approve——

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In one moment; let me finish my sentence. I desire to pass the Senate bill without amendment, not as a thing which I by any manner of means approve, because I do not believe in placing any restrictions upon new banks that are not upon old banks, and for many other reasons also. But I favor it as the best thing I can get now, and as a thing which will settle the question that more currency is needed in the judgment of the law-making power and will settle the public mind as to the intentions of Congress. For the relief of the public mind, and for the relief of the business of the country, I think we had better "pawl," as the sailors say in my country, that is, put down the catch and hold what we have got; and then we can spit upon our hands and try another heave.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that the President would not veto the bill passed by both Houses?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is an improper question ever to be addressed to a member or discussed in the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is why I asked the question. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to make that statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not observe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] use that phrase or he would have stopped him. It is an invasion of the dignity and the rights of the House of Representatives to allude to any possibility of the President's vetoing a bill passed by it.

Mr. KELLOGG. That was precisely the reason I asked the question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish what I said to be distinctly understood. I was stating upon public considerations only the reasons for my belief, and I was dealing with what is said in the newspapers, (I beg pardon of the House for doing so,) and not in any other view. I say I want this matter acted upon so that the newspaper slander (as I believe it to be) upon the Executive, of being an obstructionist to the prosperity of this country, can be refuted. In that view only, in none other, did I speak; and I mentioned the matter, speaking of negative action—never in a positive sense.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to raise the question whether it is any more parliamentary to allude to such a thing in a negative than in a positive sense?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not; that it is a subject which should never be mentioned in the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; I stand corrected. It is not parliamentary, then, to say I do not think the President would do an unwise thing.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Massachusetts has already thrown out to this House the opinion of the Executive——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not.

Mr. COX. And I think the gentleman owes it to the House to give his authority for that statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow such a matter to be discussed.

Mr. COX. It has already been discussed,

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stopped the discussion of it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have distinctly said to the contrary; and if the gentleman's ears had been as acute as they are long he would have understood it.

Mr. COX. From the length of the gentleman's ears, he would appear to be the organ of the Administration.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether I correctly understood him that, in proposing to take from the Speaker's table and have passed the Senate bill, he does not propose that as a finality on this question, but only as an entering-wedge for that further increase of the currency which he esteems desirable.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not used the word "entering-wedge."

Mr. HALE, of New York. Perhaps I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will make myself clear to the most moderate capacity. I desire to repeat that the Senate of the United States has passed a bill, now on the Speaker's table, to which the country is looking with anxiety. I want that bill to become a law, and thereby establish the principle upon which Congress means to act in regard to this great question.

Mr. FRYE. Did not the gentleman say that after the Senate bill was passed he proposed to spit on his hands and start again?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Then we do not settle the question by acting on the Senate bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We settle so much of it; we settle the principle.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say (not in continuation of the merriment which I am pleased to see enlightening and relieving somewhat this discussion) that, as chairman of the committee having this matter in charge, my wish has been to bring the subject fairly before the House for action, rather than to bring the House to adopt any peculiar views of my own or of the committee. A question of this kind, occupying such an attitude as it does before the country, demands this, I think, in fairness, of the committee having the subject in charge. Believing the House bill to be preferable in many respects to the Senate bill, it has been my desire that while the House bill was before us it should be passed upon in such a manner as the majority may think proper. There are gentlemen on this floor who know that yesterday, before we went into the debate, I expressed in private conversation the purpose, when our currency bill should be disposed of, if I could get the support of the House, to go to the Speaker's table, take up the Senate bill on the same subject, and invoke the action of the House upon it. My belief is that if the House bill should fail here the Senate bill is certainly better than nothing; and that if the House bill should be sustained and sent to the Senate, and the Senate bill also be passed here, the other branch of Congress would be placed in a position to decide whether the House bill, which I regard as a better measure, should be matured into law; and if enacted it would supersede the Senate bill. That was my intention, as there are gentlemen here who know.

I yesterday admitted for the action of the House certain amendments—all that the rules would permit to be pending; and then I called the previous question. Several gentlemen who especially desired to speak were not heard yesterday, and the previous question not being seconded, it was my intention to give those gentlemen—there are two or three of them, I believe—an opportunity to express their views, and then I proposed to ask the previous question again upon the amendments alone. The House having disposed of those amendments, the way would be open for other amendments if gentlemen thought proper to present them. I will conclude by repeating what I said in the outset, that my object is to give the House a fair opportunity to vote, not so much on matters of detail as upon great questions of principle. If the House this morning shall reconsider the vote of yesterday and shall go on with the currency bill until it is disposed of, I will endeavor, if I can do so, to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table and ask the action of the House upon it to dispose of it in its own way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very glad——

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me ask a question about the parliamentary shape of things. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, we should reconsider the vote, what then would be the status of this bill, this being Friday? Would it go over to next week, or would it go forward to-day, without reference to private bills?

The SPEAKER. At the hour of half-past one it would be in order if the House did not go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then it would not go over, but would be within the control of the majority?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. As I understand, then, if we take it up the majority will have control of it?

The SPEAKER. It is within the control of the majority of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I simply desire to say one thing further, and I will then move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and that is this: From the peculiar circumstances under which, as the papers inform us, this Senate bill was passed—and of which I know nothing but from what I see in the newspapers and in the REC-ORD—I propose not to have any amendments upon it, as far as I can control matters, if the House will sustain the action I propose, so that the question whether the country will get any relief will not be thrown into the maelstrom of debate in either House. After we have got this, which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] agrees with me so accurately in his language is better than nothing, having got that which is better than nothing, I will try to go forward and get that which is better than this, but not by amendments to this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I have an opportunity to do it, I will state that, if I should be recognized by the Speaker as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, when we go to the Speaker's table and we reach the Senate bill, I will move that the bill be put on its passage, and that I will demand the previous question and so let the majority of the House settle it in that shape.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Has the Senate bill ever been printed; for if it has I have not been able to obtain a copy?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But not printed in the usual form?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to apologize for myself. I might have been misled, in referring to the President, by the remarks of my learned colleague from the Middlesex district, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who said yesterday, speaking of the President:

> He has in every message that he has sent to Congress given in his full adhesion to those acts. Are you going—Mr. Speaker, is this House going to send him up a bill to sign, by signing which he is to abandon, renounce, and break every pledge which his party and which the people of the country have required of him? Are we going to break that pledge for ourselves?

Now I can only say I think my allusion was no more out of order than that, but I am always sorry to follow a bad example.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is this difference. The gentleman from Massachusetts to whom the gentleman refers alluded to official communications which were made to the House of Representatives by the President, which are always a fitting subject of reference in debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I only alluded to "public reasons" for my opinions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to allude to a communication which the President might send—an entirely different thing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I alluded to public reasons, and I again reiterate it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I said nothing in reference to the probable action of the President. I was referring to the action of the House, asking them whether they would send to the President after consideration a bill which involved in my judgment certain consequences. I hope I knew better the laws of propriety and the rules of the House than to talk on this floor about a veto of the President, as my colleague did this morning.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only made the reference to set right public reasons upon this question which has been the subject of public discussion. I never spoke to the President on this subject. I am not one of those who seek by discussions with him to make their legislation agree with his opinions. That is all I mean to say. I am afraid he is opposed to my views on this subject, but I do not know and I take great care not to know.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word in personal explanation to an associate on the commitee? When I spoke of my own purpose, the Senate bill not having been referred to the committee, I spoke of what I intended to do on my own responsibility, and not by direction or authority of the committee or of any member thereof.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman having spoken of what he should do, being chairman of the Commitee on Banking and Currency, thereby appeared to implicate other members of the committee in connection with the Senate bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. What I said was, that if the Speaker recognized me as occupying that position, I should have the opportunity of doing as I intimated.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite satisfied.

Mr. DONNAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should now reconsider its action postponing this bill, will the Committee on Banking and Currency be recognized as still having charge of it?

The SPEAKER. This does not at all change the relation of the committee to the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to suggest that the first section of the bill relates to the public debt of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Which bill?

Mr. DAWES. The Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is not before the House at all. The inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] was not in regard to that bill. The Chair understood the gentleman's inquiry to be in regard to the bill which on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] the House agreed to postpone. That remains in charge of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House yesterday postponed the further consideration of the currency bill until Tuesday next at half-past one o'clock.

Mr. COX. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 126, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, White, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—38.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BURCHARD. On this question Mr. CROCKER, of Massachusetts, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. If present Mr. CROCKER would vote "no," and Mr. SMITH would vote "ay."

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is detained from the House by sickness. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My colleague, Mr. HERSEY, is absent on account of ill-health. If here he would vote "no."

The SPEAKER. On the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House postponed the consideration of this bill until Tuesday next at half-past one o'clock, the ayes are 126, and the noes are 126. The Chair votes "no." The noes have it; and the House refuses to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The question recurs, Will the House reconsider the vote postponing the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On that question I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House refuses to postpone this bill does it then come up for immediate action?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will explain the state of the question. The question is, Will the House reconsider the vote postponing the consideration of the bill? If the House refuses on this vote to reconsider, the bill is postponed. If the House shall vote to reconsider, then the question will recur again, Will the House postpone? If the House should negative that, then the bill of the committee is before the House immediately. The hour of half-past one will have been reached before that vote is announced, and the committee's bill will be before the House.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the bill be open to further amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will, because the House refused to second the previous question yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then the whole thing will be opened again?

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say that if the action should be taken by the House indicated by the Speaker, inasmuch as the previous question was not seconded on yesterday, I shall accept that as the decision of the House that they desire to amend the bill further than the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is the parliamentary significance of the vote. It would be the duty of the Chair to request the gentleman to yield for amendments. The significance of the vote of yesterday was that the House desired to amend the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. What I was about to say was that I would move the previous question after one or two gentlemen have spoken on the pending amendments and let those be disposed of, and then the bill will be open to other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The previous question, as the gentleman is aware, can be made to operate on the pending amendments or upon any other amendment without affecting the bill. In that way other amendments may be offered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 120, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clymer, Coburn, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crooke, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dawes, DeWitt, Donnan, Eames, Elliott, Farwell, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Howe, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kellogg, Lamport, Lawson, Lewis, Lowndes, Luttrell, Maynard, James W. McDill, MacDougall, Mellish, Merriam, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, James H. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cason, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Herr Smith, Southard, Sprague, Tyner, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Wells, White, Whitehead, William Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—120.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. MCCRARY. I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. POLAND, who has been called away from the House. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD. Upon this question the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER, is paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SMITH. Mr. CROCKER, if here, would vote "aye," and Mr. SMITH would vote "no."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon postponing the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next at half-past one o'clock.

Mr. KASSON. I call for tellers on that question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 79, noes 106.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is now recognized as in charge of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. In accordance with the statement that I made some minutes since, if I can do so, I propose to yield to two gentlemen who thought that they were rather rigidly dealt with yesterday in the matter of speaking, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] who desired to have five minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who desires to speak fifteen minutes. If there be no objection I should be glad that they should be heard, and then I will move the previous question, not on the bill but on the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Massachusetts being allowed to speak?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. I can only say that I will endeavor, if possible, before the bill is disposed of, to see personally that those gentlemen have a hearing.

The SPEAKER. Probably by general consent amendments may be admitted now without the necessity of calling the previous question separately on each; they may be admitted by unanimous consent, and the previous question applied to the whole of them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the sense of the House shall be tested on the pending amendments; and I therefore move the previous question on those amendments. When they shall be disposed of others can be received. I will not call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment and to have it pending.

The SPEAKER. The previous question will apply simply to the amendments now pending, and will exhaust itself on those amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand that the power of amendment under the rules is exhausted until we dispose of the pending amendments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman then allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. MAYNARD. My proposition is, if I can get the support of the House, to call the previous question on the amendments pending and not on the bill. When those amendments shall have been disposed of by the action of the House then the bill will be open to further amendment; and as I have already stated I will allow further amendments to be offered.

Mr. KELLEY. I understand the gentleman to agree, in the event the other amendments are disposed of, to allow my amendment to be voted upon.

Mr. SHANKS. Will further amendments be in order after the pending amendments shall have been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. They will, provided the gentleman in charge of the bill does not call the previous question on the bill as amended.

Mr. SHANKS. And if the previous question shall not be seconded, the bill will then be open to further amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the following amendment, moved by Mr. MITCHELL:

Add to section 2 the following:

Provided, That in case any increase of national-bank note circulation beyond the present authorized limit of $354,000,000 shall take place, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel legal-tender notes to the extent of such increase until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes shall be reduced to $300,000,000; and for this purpose he is authorized to use any existing surplus revenue, or, in default of any such surplus, to sell 5 per cent. bonds of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. COX. Yes; we want the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] has made a mistake in his amendment; I think he intended to retire the national-bank notes and not the legal-tenders.

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 160, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Barnum, Bass, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Clayton, Clymer, Cotton, Cox, Crooke, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Elliott, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Hoskins, Kellogg, Kendall, Lawson, Lewis, Lowndes, Luttrell, MacDougall, Mitchell, Moore, Nesmith, Niles, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Read, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, Isaac W. Scudder, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Starkweather, Stone, Tremain, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Wood, and Woodford—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Giddings, Hagans, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Herndon, Holman, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McJunkin, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Neal, Negley, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Phillips, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Standiford, St. John, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Willie, Wilshire, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—160.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barber, Barry, Berry, Benjamin F. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Crocker, Darrall, Duell, Glover, Hereford, Hersey, Hodges, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Lamar, Lawrence, Magee, McCrary, McKee, Mills, Morrison, O'Brien, Parsons, Pelham, Poland, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sloan, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and John D. Young—51.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York. Upon this question I am paired with Mr. THORNBURGH, who if present would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is detained from the House by sickness; if present he would vote "no" on this question.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to state that Mr. CROCKER, of Massachusetts, is detained from the House by sickness. He is paired with Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. If present Mr. CROCKER would vote "ay," and Mr. SMITH would vote "no."

The next motion was upon the amendment moved by Mr. BIERY, to strike out sections 7 and 8 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 7. That associations without circulation may be organized under the provisions of the said act upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States of not less than $10,000 of United States registered bonds, as provided in section 16 of said act; and associations already organized without circulation are authorized to withdraw their bonds in excess of $10,000.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the begining of each and every month from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange and as a substitute for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask for a division of the question, so that the vote may be taken upon each section separately.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent that can be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are separate and distinct sections.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the gentleman has a right to frame a motion to cover both. The Clerk will read the rule bearing upon the question.

The Clerk read, as follows:

But it has been invariably held, and never appealed from, that the rules in regard to division of the question apply to no other description of bills than such as make "appropriations of money for works of internal improvement."

The SPEAKER. The rule in regard to the division of questions was inserted to prevent what was popularly known as log-rolling on internal-improvement bills; and it was never held that an amendment which a gentleman desired to make in that way was divisible.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will not the effect of this vote be to link free banking with the issue of gold notes?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question; the Chair does not rule upon effects of legislation.

Mr. SPEER. For the purpose of obtaining a division of this question, I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done; the previous question is partly executed. The House can get at it if they desire, for there is nothing that can be done under the Constitution and laws of the United States which a majority cannot do.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Chair indicate the way?

Mr. CESSNA. Can it not be done in this way? Vote down this amendment, and then let my colleague [Mr. BIERY] or some other member move to strike out each section separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to suggest that which has been so well stated by the gentleman. When the previous question shall have been exhausted, which will be when the pending amendments have been disposed of, further amendments will be in order. But as the question now stands, with the previous question operating, the gentleman is entitled to a vote on his motion as he has submitted it.

Mr. CONGER. If these two sections should be stricken out, after the previous question has exhausted itself would it be in order to move as an amendment to insert one of the sections?

The SPEAKER. Without the other it would.

Mr. MAYNARD. I propose that by general consent we take a vote on each section separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that the other method would be the more direct.

Mr. RANDALL. And much the best.

The SPEAKER. If the House desires to reach the conclusion the gentleman from Michigan indicates, it can first refuse to strike out both sections, and then vote to strike out one. The other will then remain as a part of the text of the bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BIERY to amend by striking out sections 7 and 8, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 68, noes 102.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to amend by striking out the eighth section.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order now. The operation of the previous question is not exhausted. The next question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to amend the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] by adding a new section. The gentleman from New York has proposed a substitute which is identical in the first five sections with the bill of the committee, but the concluding sections are different. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend this substitute by adding as a new section what will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. as therein prescribed shall be applied solely to the non-interest-bearing debt of the United States, known as United States notes, which said notes, when purchased, shall be canceled and forever retired from circulation. The first application of said 1 per cent. to the purposes aforesaid shall be made after the 1st day of July, 1874, and within that fiscal year.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER. By general consent that can be done.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. As the previous question is operating, the gentleman cannot withdraw the amendment except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 34, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. As the vote is close, the Chair orders tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. NEGLEY, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. MELLISH.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 48, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 162, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barnum, Bass, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Clayton, Clymer, Cox, Creamer, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Elliott, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Hoskins, Hubbell, Kellogg, Kendall, Lawson, Lewis, Lowndes, Luttrell, James W. McDill, MacDougall, Merriam, Mitchell, Moore, Niles, Page, Hosea W. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Wood, and Woodford—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Field, Fort, Freeman, Giddings, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Milliken, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Neal, Negley, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Phillips, Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Read, Richmond, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, St. John, Stone, Stowell, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Wallace, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—162.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barry, Berry, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Crocker, Duell, Farwell, Glover, Hereford, Hersey, Howe, Hunton, Hurlbut, Jewett, Lamport, Lawrence, Magee, McCrary, McKee, Mills, Morrison, Nesmith, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Purman, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sloan, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and John D. Young—55.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. TOWNSEND. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. SAYLER. If he were here he would vote in the negative, and I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. COMINGO. My colleague, Mr. GLOVER, who is detained from the House by sickness, would, if present, vote "no."

Mr. AVERILL. My colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is absent on account of sickness. If here he would vote "no."

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER, who, if present, would vote "ay," is paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SMITH, who would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] whether his substitute contains the first five sections of the committee's bill, including the amendments made to that bill in the House yesterday.

Mr. MERRIAM. Five sections of this bill are exactly the same as five sections of the original bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask that the substitute be read.

The Clerk read the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. MERRIAM, as follows:

That section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and section 21 of the original act, to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment, be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted; and that section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained.

SEC. 2. That section 31 of the said act approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act approved June 30, 1864, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum, in United States notes, equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed, under penalty of forfeiture of charter. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or, if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes instead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

SEC. 4. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury, in payment, or deposit for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter numbers of the association by which they are severally issued.

SEC. 6. That any national bank desiring to withdraw a portion of its circulation may, upon deposit of United States notes in sums of not less than $9,000 with the Treasurer of the United States, withdraw bonds pledged to secure a like amount of its circulation; and the Treasurer shall redeem, cancel, and destroy an amount of the circulating notes of such association equal to the amount issued upon such bonds: Provided, That the bonds on deposit with the Treasurer shall not be reduced below $50,000.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the substitute is adopted, will it be in order to amend or strike out any portion of it?

The SPEAKER. Not to strike out.

Mr. BURCHARD. Or to amend any portion by striking out, or to amend by striking out any portion of it?

The SPEAKER. Nothing can be stricken out. After the House agrees to certain words in a particular form it is not in order to entertain a motion to change those words.

Mr. PENDLETON. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to the substitute now?

The SPEAKER. It would not; because the previous question is operating.

The question being taken on Mr MERRIAM's substitute, there were—ayes 69, noes 81.

Mr. MERRIAM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 23, not a sufficient number.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 28, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused and the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers on the question of agreeing to the substitute of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.] The gentleman from New York, Mr. MERRIAM, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SPEER, will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 89.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The operation of the previous question, which was ordered on the amendments, is now exhausted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] who has charge of the bill, is recognized by the Chair. He will state whether he yields for further amendments and to whom.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any particular order in which amendments can be offered? Have amendments of which notice was given some weeks ago any precedence or not?

The SPEAKER. They have not, of course. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] called the previous question on the amendments. That has now been exhausted; and the Chair recognized the gentleman because he did not know but he desired to call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to yield to my colleague [Mr. BIERY] to allow him to move to strike out the eighth section.

Mr. MAYNARD. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIERY] failed because it included two sections. I stated yesterday that I had been instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to move an amendment to strike out the seventh section. I did not press that because I found that it would take up time. I now renew that amendment, to strike out the seventh section; and pending that I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer an amendment.

Mr. BIERY. I move to amend the bill by striking out the eighth section.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether any further amendments are in order?

The SPEAKER. They are not, if the rules are strictly enforced.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it in order to move a substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move a substitute if the gentleman from Tennessee yields for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield to have it read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move as a substitute, not the Senate bill, which is on the Speaker's table, but a bill in exactly the words of the Senate bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I did not yield for that. I am told that this is the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. That is what the gentleman from Massachusetts has announced.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not yield to have it read, for the reasons I have already stated. When we dispose of this bill, I propose, if I can, to go to the Speaker's table and take up the Senate bill for action.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You cannot.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it the right of the gentleman from Tennessee not only to move such amendments as he pleases, but to allow members, not of his committee, to offer such amendments to those amendments as he sees fit, and at the same time to cut off the right of every other member whose amendments he does not choose to admit?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee cannot cut off the right of every other member, unless the majority of the House shall second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BECK. Can only those amendments be offered which the gentleman admits?

The SPEAKER. Unless the majority of the House shall second the demand for the previous question on the bill and amendments, he cannot do so. It is in the power of the House to keep the bill open for amendments for six months.

Mr. BECK. Does not this give a great advantage to the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the rules of the House give a vast advantage to the gentleman who has charge of the bill.

Mr. BECK. Is he not allowed in this way to admit the amendments of his own friends and prevent all others from offering amendments? If that is the position of the matter we may as well lay the bill on the table as soon as possible. I make that motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offered yesterday an amendment to strike out the seventh section. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIERY] to strike out the seventh and eighth sections was disposed of under the previous question with the understanding that it was to be renewed when the question could be divided; and I cannot, in justice to the House, or as a matter of fair play, deny the opportunity to vote on these amendments. I call the previous question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to lay the bill on the table now in order?

The SPEAKER. Of course; and the Chair is about to recognize it and state it to the House. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] who has charge of the bill, moves to strike out the seventh section of it, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIERY] moves to amend the amendment by striking out the eighth section.

Mr. BECK. Who gave the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania? The gentleman from Tennessee gave him the floor and is farming it out to his own friends.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania made this motion before, and I yielded to him to renew it in conformity with what I understood to be the understanding of the House.

Mr. BECK. This is the first time the gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered it in this form, while twenty other gentlemen have given notice of amendments three weeks ago, and now the gentleman from Tennessee is farming out the floor to those whose amendments will do as little harm as possible to his bantling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee is clearly exercising no more than his parliamentary rights in accordance with the uniform usage of the House, and unless a majority of the House stands behind the gentleman from Tennessee he is entirely powerless. If a majority do stand behind him it is the duty of the Chair to see that he has his rights, and that is all there is in it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not seen where a majority have stood behind him.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Tennessee demand the previous question simply on the two amendments, or on the amendments and the bill?

Mr. MAYNARD. On the two amendments, sir; and I wish to state that they are separate and independent amendments. They were intended by me and by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be offered separately, so that a vote of the House might be taken separately on each.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. It is not understood whether, if the previous question is seconded, other amendments will be cut off.

The SPEAKER. They will not; the previous question will exhaust itself on the two amendments now pending.

Mr. SPEER. Will the question be put first upon striking out the seventh section?

The SPEAKER. The question will be first on striking out the seventh section, and then on striking out the eighth section. They will be voted on separately.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being first upon striking out the seventh section of the bill.

The Clerk read the seventh section, as follows:

SEC. 7. That associations without circulation may be organized under the provisions of the said act upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States of not less than $10,000 of United States registered bonds, as provided in section 16 of said act; and associations already organized without circulation are authorized to withdraw their bonds in excess of $10,000.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 114, noes 56.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only 19 members voting therefor.

So the motion to strike out the seventh section was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BIERY's motion to strike out the eighth section of the bill.

The Clerk read the eighth section, as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the beginning of each and every month from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange and as a substitute for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 93, noes 71.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 95, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. So the motion to strike out the eighth section of the bill was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. McCRARY. I desire to state that my pair with Mr. POLAND, of Vermont, still continues. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. ROSS. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. SCOFIELD, has been unexpectedly called out of the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am paired with Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. LYNCH. I am paired with Mr. ELLIOTT, of South Carolina. If present he would vote in the negative, and I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BURCHARD. Upon this question I desire to state that Mr. CROCKER, of Massachusetts, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. I am authorized by them both to say that if present Mr. CROCKER would vote "no," and Mr. SMITH would vote "ay."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their Clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to currency and free banking.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to reconsider the several votes that have been taken on amendments to the pending bill, and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have disposed of all the amendments which were pending to this bill when the House adjourned on yesterday. The last two amendments which have been voted upon were simply a reproduction in another form of the amendment offered on yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIERY.] I indicated this morning that I would allow further amendments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] informs me that he desires to move an amendment, and I will hear it read.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to amend the bill by adding as section 7 that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the amount of United States notes in circulation be limited, except as hereinafter provided, to $400,000,000; and that any holder of said notes presenting any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple thereof, to the Treasury of the United States, or any of the sub-treasuries, shall receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, which the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to prepare and furnish for that purpose; said bonds to mature as follows: One-half part in thirty years and one-half part in fifty years from the date of the issue thereof; and that, hereafter, when any person shall demand of the Treasurer of the United States or any assistant treasurer, the redemption of said bonds, it shall be the duty of said Treasurer or assistant treasurer to pay in United States notes the principal of said bond or bonds with accured interest: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the reissue of the notes so redeemed, or the receiving and paying out the same, from time to time, by the Government, with full benefit and subject to all other provisions of law in relation to such notes.

Mr. KELLEY. With the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] I move to substitute for the amendment just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk. I will state that it has been before the members of the House on their file for some time.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the amount of United States notes in circulation be limited, except as hereinafter provided, to $400,000,000; and that any holder of said notes presenting any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, or any of the assistant treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of bonds of the United States, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, which the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to prepare and furnish for that purpose; and that when any person shall demand of the Treasurer of the United States, or any assistant treasurer, redemption of said bonds, it shall be the duty of said Treasurer or assistant treasurer to pay in United States notes the principal of said bond or bonds with accrued interest, and cancel and forward the bonds thus redeemed to the Treasurer of the United States forthwith, in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe; and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared United States notes of the several denominations now in use to the amount of $50,000,000, which shall be held as a reserve or redemption fund for the purpose of securing prompt payment of said bonds when demanded, and the United States notes so held in reserve shall be used only when needed for the payment of said bonds on their presentation, and shall be withdrawn and placed again in reserve out of any United States notes not otherwise appropriated received by the Treasury Department thereafter; and the whole amount of United States notes received by the Treasury Department in exchange for said bonds, bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, shall be appropriated and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury as rapidly as practicable to the purchase or redemption of any bonds of the United States outstanding at the passage of this act, or the purchase of gold with which to redeem and cancel any of said bonds called for redemption by the Treasurer; and that national banks are hereby authorized to hold said bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest instead of the reserve of United States notes now required by law.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order at this time to move to lay this bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] yields the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to make that motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have yielded the floor merely to allow these amendments to be read, and I will permit them to be offered and be pending to the bill. At the instance of many gentlemen around me I desire now to test the sense of the House whether they wish any further amendment made. I therefore call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. KELLOGG. And pending that motion I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. COX. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer a substitute for the bill, being the text of the Senate bill.

Mr. BECK. I desire to move an amendment to that substitute.

The SPEAKER. There are as many amendments pending to the bill proper as can be moved under the rules.

Mr. DAWES. If I may be recognized, I think under parliamentary rules I am in order.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. DAWES. To move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. DAWES. If the Chair will recognize me, I can then take the ruling of the Chair upon the motion I may make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is very familiar with the rules of the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has admitted two amendments—an amendment, and an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Now I wish to move to amend that for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] moves his substitute.

Mr. MAYNARD. But I have moved the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Would not my motion be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. DAWES. I believe the parliamentary rule is that the matter proposed to be struck out may be first perfected before the motion to strike out is put.

The SPEAKER. But in this case there is nothing moved to be struck out. The Chair will state the position of the question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] moves to amend the pending bill by adding a new section.

Mr. DAWES. And then his colleague [Mr. KELLEY] moves a substitute for that. Now, Mr. Speaker, is not a motion to amend that substitute in order?

The SPEAKER. If this were a motion to strike out anything in the bill, it would be in order to perfect the text before taking the question on striking out. But the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] is to insert something. The gentleman from Massachusetts will see the distinction. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] had moved to strike out a section of the bill, and there was an amendment pending thereto as a substitute, of course that section could be perfected before the motion to strike out was put. But this is an amendment to insert something.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Chair recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have this question settled to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Speaker is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the bill and the two amendments he has admitted. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] desires to offer as a substitute for the entire bill the text of the Senate bill now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BECK. And I wish to amend that substitute.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. I submit that there is great confusion in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's point is well taken. If the House will be in order, the Chair will endeavor to explain the situation of the bill so that members may vote intelligently. The bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency has now been amended by striking out the seventh and eighth sections. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] moves to amend by adding a new section in relation to convertible bonds. His colleague [Mr. KELLEY] moves as a substitute for that amendment another proposition on the same subject. The gentleman from Tennessee who has charge of the bill asks for the previous question upon the bill and these two amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. I modify my motion and move the previous question on the amendments only.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is better.

Mr. KELLOGG. And pending the demand for the previous question, I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state and submit that motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Tennessee has remarked more than once that he proposed to go to the Speaker's table and take up the Senate bill after this bill is passed. I wish to ask whether, under the rules, in the present condition of business he can do it?

The SPEAKER. Not to-day, unless the House should have a morning hour.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is rather late in the afternoon for the "morning hour."

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to remark that to order the previous question on the bill and amendments would exclude the substitute which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] desires to move and the amendment which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] desires to offer to that substitute; and if the House desired a vote on those propositions it would have to refuse the demand for the previous question. The gentleman from Tennessee now, however, demands the previous question upon the two amendments only. Pending the motion for the previous question, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] moves that the bill and amendments lie on the table.

Mr. COX. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. It has several times been proposed to substitute the Senate bill for this. I wish to inquire whether, if the House should do that, the Senate bill would be passed into a law so far as the two Houses are concerned? Would not the effect be to send this bill back to the Senate to be acted upon there?

The SPEAKER. Of course. It is not strictly correct to speak of moving the Senate bill as an amendment to this bill. The Senate bill itself could not be offered as an amendment, but only the words of the Senate bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly. My object is to get the words of the Senate bill adopted by the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the substitute indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] were adopted, the Senate bill would still stand in the House precisely where it is now?

The SPEAKER. The effect would be to send back to the Senate their bill as a House bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And the Senate bill would still occupy its place on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The House would have in its possession the Senate bill, while the Senate would receive a House bill in precisely the same words.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be in order, after the morning hour to-morrow, to move to go to the Speaker's table and in that way reach the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order any day, after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. And if the House should pass the Senate bill, that bill would not require to go again to the Senate; that body would simply be informed that the House had concurred in its passage.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. COX. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 82, nays 165, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Arthur, Barnum, Bass, Berry, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Clayton, Clymer, Cox, Creamer, Crooke, Dawes, De Witt, Durham, Eames, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Hoskins, Kellogg, Kendall, Lawson, Lowndes, Luttrell, MacDougall, Mellish, Mitchell, Moore, Nesmith, Niles, O Brien, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Randall, Read, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Speer, Starkweather, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. So the House refused to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE. My colleague, Mr. LEACH, having been taken with a chill, had to leave the Hall. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STORM. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. CLYMER. My colleague, Mr. MAGEE, is still absent. If he had been here he would have voted "ay."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am paired with Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. If he were present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. Mr. CROCKER would vote "ay," and Mr. SMITH, "no."

Mr. LYNCH. I am paired with Mr. ELLIOTT, of South Carolina. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the two amendments moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] and his colleague, [Mr. KELLEY.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Will the House substitute the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for that of his colleague, [Mr. NEGLEY?]

Mr. SPEER. I ask to have it again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken on substituting Mr. KELLEY's amendment for that of Mr. NEGLEY, there were—ayes 109, noes 78.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, Will the House now amend the bill by inserting what has been moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and which the House has agreed to substitute for the amendment offered by his colleague, [Mr. NEGLEY?]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COBURN. Would it be in order to move to amend the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would not, because the previous question is operating.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 42.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 120, nays 122, not voing 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Burrows, Benjamin F. So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. LYNCH. I am paired on this vote with Mr. ELLIOTT, of South Carolina. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD. I beg to announce that Mr. CROCKER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, are paired. Mr. CROCKER would vote "no," and Mr. SMITH would vote "ay."

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky. I am paired with Mr. STORM, of Pennsylvania. Mr. STORM if he were here would vote "no," and I would vote "ay." I am in favor of expansion, and Mr. STORM is opposed to it.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MAYNARD. To test the sense of the House, I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion, there were—ayes 123, noes 62.

Mr. DURHAM. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 42.

Several MEMBERS. Let the other side be counted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers on the question of ordering the yeas and nays; and appoints Mr. RANDALL and Mr. MAYNARD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 170.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the motion to adjourn over. I do not want to make a struggle about it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I renew the motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The motion being renewed, the yeas and nays will be regarded as ordered on it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 131, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Averill, Banning, Barber, Bass, Beck, Berry, Blount, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Benjamin F. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, and Woodworth—60.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, that the House adjourn.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 82, noes 85.

Mr. SENER. I call for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays for the present.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let us pass the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I withdraw it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then let us have tellers on the question.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. If gentlemen insist on tellers, I insist on the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask one question. Did the Chair declare the motion to adjourn carried or lost?

The SPEAKER. The vote was 82 in favor of the motion and 85 against it. The Chair has not made a declaration of the vote yet, because it has not reached a conclusion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 16 members voting therefor.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. DUNNELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 111, noes 105.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order that the yeas and nays have been refused.

The SPEAKER. The House refused to order the yeas and nays on the question of adjournment. What the gentleman from Tennessee desires can only be reached by reconsidering the vote on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. KILLINGER. I desire to ask the Chair whether the bill will come up to-morrow unless the previous question is seconded this evening?

The SPEAKER. It will come up at half-past one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move, then, to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I submit that it is too late to move to reconsider on the question of adjournment after the vote has been ascertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A motion to reconsider is certainly not in order.

The SPEAKER. Why not? It all pertains to the question of making certain the vote.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is a supplemental motion to the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. O, no; it is a question, the gentleman from Massachusetts will see, of determining whether the House desires to adjourn.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That I understand; but the point is this: that a motion to adjourn is not a motion to which a motion to reconsider applies.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not applying the motion to reconsider to the motion to adjourn.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Chair does not do me the honor to listen until I have stated the point before he answers. The point to which I was coming was that all motions which relate to a motion to adjourn, like a call for the yeas and nays upon it, stand on the same footing as a motion to adjourn, and that a motion to reconsider is not applicable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be compelled to overrule the point, and he thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] upon reflection, will agree with him. There might be a very important vote involved, and by inadvertence the House might refuse to order the yeas and nays upon it. Then on the eve of an adjournment the House might desire by a very large majority to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays had been refused. All that goes to a certain determination of whether the House now desires to adjourn is certainly a part of the rule, and this question of reconsidering the vote by which the House refused to order the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn certainly relates to the question of whether the House does actually desire to adjourn. Of course the yeas and nays cannot be ordered and taken on the question of reconsideration; that question must be decided by a vote upon a division or by tellers, and a majority is required to reconsider the vote by which the order for the yeas and nays was refused. The same majority that desires not to adjourn can reconsider the vote on ordering the yeas and nays, and then the question of yeas and nays can again be submitted to the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Must not the vote to reconsider the refusal of the House to order the yeas and nays be the same as that by which the yeas and nays could have been ordered in the first place?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. One-fifth of the members present and voting can order the yeas and nays when again submitted. But it is for the House to determine by a majority vote whether it will make such a reconsideration as will enable the question of ordering the yeas and nays to be again submitted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then we will not reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The House refused to order the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, and then ordered that the vote on adjournment should be taken by tellers. The vote was so taken, and the tellers reported that a majority of the members present and voting had voted to adjourn. That was final.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It was final thus far——

Mr. RANDALL. In what respect had the Chair the right to entertain any other motion?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will observe, he will see that the Chair was correct in entertaining the motion to reconsider. Suppose nothing had been said about the yeas and nays up to the time when the tellers made their report upon the motion to adjourn. The Chair announces that the tellers report that there were 111 in the affirmative and 105 in the negative. Instantly a demand for the yeas and nays is made, and the House would have the right to determine whether the yeas and nays should be called. Certainly it is just as proper at that point to permit the House to determine whether it will reconsider the vote by which the demand for the yeas and nays had been refused on the same motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the Chair had the right to entertain the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will listen——

Mr. RANDALL. I am listening; but it seems to me that the Speaker wants to do all the talking.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a right to be heard upon this point. The House will observe that in every case—and the Chair makes no exception—in every case the motion to reconsider any vote is as highly privileged as is the original motion. Now, if after the tellers have reported their count a call for the yeas and nays is in order, not having been previously made, certainly a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House had previously refused to order the yeas and nays is equally in order, by all parliamentary law, in the opinion of the Chair, beyond the possibility of a doubt.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose the yeas and nays had been ordered, could the order be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, before the House proceeded to execute the order.

Mr. GARFIELD. By a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. The House can by a majority vote reconsider an order for the yeas and nays, and then that question would have to be again submitted. Of course it must be determined ultimately by one-fifth.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose that some member of the House were to appeal from this ruling of the Chair, and on that appeal call for the yeas and nays. The result would be that the House might be kept here to take the yeas and nays on that appeal, although a large majority might desire to adjourn at once.

The SPEAKER. The result would simply be that the Chair would not entertain the appeal.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then, is not that the same principle for which I am contending, to wit, that the motion to adjourn being itself incapable of being reconsidered, the question of ordering the yeas and nays upon it and all other questions connected with it are equally incapable of being reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. This may not be an important question, so far as the present occasion for it is concerned, but in order that there may be no misapprehension about it hereafter, when it may be extremely important, the Chair desires the House to fully understand it. The right to have the yeas and nays is the most sacred right under the rules of the House, for it is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and guaranteed to one-fifth of the members of the House. And the right to reconsider any action which the House may take is the most highly privileged of motions. Now, the House by inadvertence, probably without the members realizing the importance of an adjournment at this time, might have refused to order the yeas and nays. Upon a vote by tellers the motion to adjourn was agreed to. It may have then occurred to several members that there ought not to be an adjournment at this time, and they might desire to have that question tested by the yeas and nays. The only way to do that is to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the yeas and nays, in order to ascertain whether or not one-fifth do actually desire the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Has not the House already exercised that highly constitutional right which it possesses and refused to order the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. But the House has not exercised the highly privileged right of reconsideration which it possesses. The question now is, Will the House reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused on the motion to adjourn?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us have tellers on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen who last acted as tellers, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, and the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. DUNNELL, will again act.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Does it require a majority vote to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It does; and that entirely preserves the right of the majority, for the same majority in favor of adjournment can refuse to reconsider.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 104, noes 111.

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the yeas and nays was not agreed to.

The result of the vote upon adjournment was announced as above stated; and accordingly (at six o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.
